Addressed to Foreign Office telegram No. 1125 of April 13th,
Repeated for information to Tokyo, Peking,
Moscow and Singapore.

Your telegrams Nos. 1418 and 1419: Japanese Peace Treaty.

Dulles expressed a desire to see me before leaving for Tokyo and I called on him at State Department yesterday evening. He began by saying that the object of his visit was to emphasise to the Japanese political leaders that the replacement of MacArthur meant no change in United States policy. He would explain that the United States was if anything even more anxious to see early conclusion of a Peace Treaty. The Japanese had taken a risk in agreeing to invite the United States to retain troops in and about Japan after the Peace Treaty. Now that MacArthur, the arch exponent of resistance to communist aggression, had gone, they might be having qualms about this decision, If so, Dulles would do his best to re-assure them.

2. Dulles then handed me an aide memoire on Chinese participation in the Treaty negotiations and Formosa, in reply to the aide memoire I left with him on March 30th. With regard to Chinese participation, aide memoire, full text of which follows by bag, contains the words "Government of the United States accordingly does not see how, in so far as it is concerned, the views of His Majesty's Government could be implemented". Dulles said that he wanted to stress the words "in so far as it is concerned". If we wished ourselves to initiate some approach to Peking on the Japanese Treaty, United States Government would not interpose any objections, but very much hoped that the process would not lead to delays.

3. Tomlinson had already discussed Chinese representation and Formosa with Allison along the lines of the instructions contained in your telegrams under reference. I then went over much of the same ground with Dulles. On Formosa, our view was that the Peace Treaty should make some gesture in the direction of "China" because of our commitment under the Cairo Declaration, because we thought it a mistake to leave Formosa as territory under no sovereignty, and because we thought that it would help in the future relations of all of us with the Japanese if Japan had ceded Formosa to somebody. On this last point it appeared from the United States aide memoire that Mr. Dulles took a different view. Whatever our legitimate differences might be Mr. Dulles should not assume there had been any sudden change in the policy of His Majesty's Government and that we were now anxious to see the physical transfer of Formosa to communist rule take place at once. We still maintained all the reservations on this point of which the United States Government had long been aware.

4. Dulles then said that he understood that I had expressed concern over the distorted stories about His Majesty's Government's attitude on the two points under discussion which had appeared in the press. He gave some not very convincing explanations and excuses and said that they would do what they could to prevent a recurrence. I said that we should be grateful for anything they could do.

5. Finally I asked Dulles whether he had anything to say to us about the Pacific Pact. He replied that there were one or two outstanding points under discussion with the Joint Chiefs of Staff and he hoped that we should get a reply early next week.

Foreign Office please pass to Tokyo, Peking, Moscow and Singapore as my telegrams Nos. 23, 11, 18, and 19 respectively.

I have given further thought to Chinese participation in the Japanese Peace Treaty and to the article about Formosa.
