SAN FRANCISCO CONFERENCE

September 4-8, 1951

POLISH EMBASSY
2640 SIXTEENTH STREET, N. W. WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE STATEMENTS in the following pages were made by Stefan Wierblowski, Poland's Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs and Chairman of the Polish Delegation to the San Francisco conference held from September 4-8, 1951, on the question of a peace treaty with Japan.

In support of the Soviet Union's motion that an immediate invitation be sent to the Central People's Government of the Chinese People's Republic to participate in the San Francisco conference, Mr. Wierblowski made the following statement:

FIRST of all, I must protest most vigorously against the methods which are being used here. Even though I have made many requests to the Chairman to be heard on such an important question as the participation of the Chinese People's Republic in the present conference, the Chairman, despite generally accepted procedure, has not granted me the right to speak. Such treatment is not only an insult to my Delegation and an insult to all the participants in this conference, but also a violation of the sovereignty of my Government. And now finally, when the Chairman has made up his mind to grant me the right to speak, he is limiting the time of my speech to five minutes. It is a new violation of conference rules. Until the rules of procedure have been accepted, the Chairman has no right to impose any time limit on my speech. I want to lodge a firm protest against these methods.

We have assembled here in order to discuss the problems connected with the conclusion of a peace treaty with Japan; that is, to discuss the key problems for building the foundations of a lasting peace in the Far East, so important for easing the tense situation existing throughout the world.

The representatives of fifty-one Governments from different continents are present in the conference hall. However, the representatives of that nation which was first to be attacked by Japan and which waged the longest struggle against Japanese imperialist aggression, is missing. The Chinese people fought for fourteen years; they fought selflessly against the aggressor long before Pearl Harbor. Their blood was shed, millions were slaughtered and their country ruined. Now we are witnessing attempts to prevent their representatives from participating in a conference on a treaty which concerns them most of all.

The initiative to omit the representatives of the Chinese nation from this conference came from the United States Government and was supported by the British Government—Governments which are thousands of miles away from Japan. The question of a peace treaty with Japan concerns first of all the nations which border on Japan and which were included in the aggressive program of Japanese imperialism—in the plans of the Tanaka, Konoye, Matsuoka and Tojo clique. Whereas China and other nations of Asia have been maintaining relations with Japan for thousands of years, the United States appeared in the Pacific far from her own frontiers as late as the first half of the Nineteenth Century when United States warships blasted the way for American expansion. Today, a state on the American continent wishes to exclude the greatest nation of Asia, a nation most interested in normal relations throughout Asia, from participating in a decision on one of the most important problems of the Far East. This attitude is so shameful, so absurd and so completely without precedent that it must evoke the indignation and protest of all honest people throughout the world.

We refuse to be dictated to by the United States. The Polish nation watches with admiration the rebirth of the Chinese nation with which it is linked by bonds of true and deep friendship. We cannot imagine any discussion concerning Asia without the participation of the Chinese nation. We are of the opinion that even if no understanding were reached on this issue, facts and the pattern of international relations would make it necessary that the Government of the Chinese People's Republic should be in the forefront of those who have to work out the treaty with Japan. It is not important whether the United States Government likes or does not like the Chinese Government since it is not important at all whom the United States Government likes or dislikes. It is not important here whether the United States Government recognizes the Chinese Government and whether it maintains diplomatic relations with it. These things are of complete indifference. What is important is that one, and only one Government, exists which rules according to the will of the Chinese people and which is the only representative of the Chinese state. And because this Government's rule extends over the whole of China with the exception of the island of Taiwan—which is under illegal occupation by American troops—it should be participating in the present discussions.

This follows from the history of the past war and from the necessity to secure peace in the Far East. But regardless of these facts there are other concrete commitments. China was a signatory to the United Nations Declaration of January 1, 1942. Thus the conclusion of this present treaty without its participation is a breach of faith; it is a breach of the obligation not to conclude separate peace treaties.

China was a signatory to the Cairo Declaration of December 1, 1943, which provided for common and concrete action against Japan and the restitution of a number of Chinese possessions seized during the war. China was a signatory to the Potsdam Agreement of July 26, 1945 on the question of the capitulation of Japan, and finally China accepted, together with the others, the surrender of Japan on September 2, 1945.

According to the Potsdam Agreement, China is a member of the Council of Foreign Ministers whose task it is to prepare peace treaties, and among others, the treaty with Japan. By what right has China been excluded from the conclusion of this treaty and why is it not represented at the conference devoted to the treaty with Japan? The deliberate policy of dictation by the United States and the policy of imposing its will—a policy which the United States has been pursuing for a long time—is the source of this exclusion. The policy of arbitrary extension of the Monroe Doctrine to other continents and of unlimited expansion is the basis for the hostile move against the Chinese nation.

But without the presence of China no conference can properly fulfill its tasks. It might be very interesting to listen to the opinion of the representatives of other states but without the voice of the representatives of a nation of 500 million which for fourteen years waged a struggle against the Japanese aggressor, waged a fight long before Pearl Harbor—such a conference cannot yield proper results.

The United States is obviously of another opinion. Just as the history of the Far East began for it when the first United States ships appeared in the Pacific, so the war in the Far East began for it in 1941—as if there had been no previous occupation of Manchuria, no heroic fight of the People's Army, no struggles of the whole Chinese people against the Japanese imperialists.

The attitude of the United States and Great Britain is expressed in a number of resolutions in the circulated draft treaty. This draft also contains Article 26 which may concern China—an article without precedent in the history of peace treaties. It states Japan's readiness to conclude a bilateral peace treaty with those states which signed the United Nations Declaration of January 1, 1942 and which will not become parties to the present draft treaty.

Japan has been given the right to conclude a treaty with China. But since such a treaty, as envisaged in the draft, must be based precisely on the model of the Anglo-American draft, this would mean nothing but the imposition on China of the Anglo-American draft treaty. The United States and Great Britain give Japan the right to impose a treaty on China—a situation which has no equal.

We have complete respect for the Japanese nation and we wish it to join the family of peace-loving nations as soon as possible, but we cannot, after all, forget the fact that it was imperialist Japan which attacked China, ruined the country and severed a part of its territory.

The United States is attempting to create a situation where the vanquished country is to impose its will upon one of the main participants in the struggles and victories of the Second World War in the Far East.

In behalf of the Polish Delegation I support the motion that an immediate invitation be sent by this conference to the representatives of the Central People's Government of the Chinese People's Republic to participate in the present conference in its work on the peace treaty withe Japan. The largest nation of Asia, representing a quarter of all mankind, must sit among us if these deliberations are really to lead to the consolidation of peace.

Mr. Wierblowski made the statement below at the conference session of September 7, 1951:

IN beginning my speech regarding the peace treaty with Japan, I would like to draw your attention to a well-known historical truth which in the recent past has been forgotten too often or purposely concealed.

The Second World War, a struggle lasting six years, required great efforts on the part of the United Nations in order to annihilate fascism and militarism, the sources of aggression, and to secure the conditions for a permanent peace—a peace which would give countries living under different economic and political systems the possibility of peaceful cooperation based upon the principles of security, equality and self-determination. That is why, wherever the war was fought, on all fronts, in all theaters of war, wherever Allied soldiers died, their war was a joint war; on all fronts the war was carried on against the triangle of aggression, Berlin-Rome-Tokyo.

I speak here as the representative of a nation which suffered greatly from this war; a nation which for six years was occupied by the enemy, and which during six difficult years of occupation by the enemy fought stubbornly against Hitlerism and fascism, and which next to the Soviet Union and China suffered the greatest losses in human life. I am reminding you of the tragic figure of our losses in this war, six million lives.

I am speaking on the question of the peace treaty with Japan first of all because we have always believed and we believe now that the war against fascism, wherever it was fought, was the one great common fight of all peace-loving nations for freedom and for independence. We have always believed that a peace treaty with Japan, while dealing first of all with peace in the Far East, is inseparably connected with peace in the entire world. This was fully confirmed in all joint statements of the Allies, in all their documents and agreements signed during the war and at the end of military operations. The authors of these agreements were the Great Powers because they took upon themselves the main burden of the war; in drafting them, however, they spoke for all of the United Nations. In all these documents they took upon themselves the obligation with regard to one another and the other United Nations to wage a joint fight against a common foe and jointly to build a common foundation for a future peace.

These solemn obligations are still in force today. Nevertheless, these commitments have long been violated by the western countries, primarily the United States. That country, which did not suffer the destruction of war on its territory, has completely stopped living up to the commitments which it voluntarily accepted and has begun to make illegal and unilateral decisions. At first the United States began a juridical game to dodge its commitments; today it violates them openly, callously and shamelessly. For how else can one take the statement to the effect that the Declaration of the United Nations of January 1, 1942—a Declaration in which the Great Powers and together with them others of the United Nations agreed not to conclude a separate armistice and peace—is not binding now. This Declaration makes a very clear difference between the armistice and the conclusion of a peace treaty, and it consequently places upon the Great Powers primarily the obligation of joint action, regardless of when these treaties are concluded. That follows also from other documents signed by the United States. In November, 1943, in Moscow, the Four Powers expanded and emphasized the meaning of the Declaration of January 1, 1942. In Teheran, that same year, the Three Powers confirmed that they were bound and that all the United Nations were bound by these agreements to prepare a peace which will command good will from the overwhelming masses of the peoples of the world and banish the scourge and terror of war for many generations.

On the basis of these commitments the principles of Yalta and Potsdam were formulated. Today in San Francisco the United States is making another attempt to destroy these provisions in such an important matter as the question of peace in the Far East. Contrary to a clear commitment, the preparation of the peace treaty was not given to the Council of Foreign Ministers, thereafter to be made the subject of discussion at a large international conference. It is a well-known fact, after all, that this five-power organ was primarily created for this purpose. We must reject the statement that the question of the peace treaty with Japan is not within the competence of the Council of Foreign Ministers.

The reference that at the time of the acceptance of the Potsdam decisions the Soviet Union was not yet formally at war with Japan is not valid and is a fallacious argument because it was decided by the Yalta Agreement, with the approval of all Three Powers, when the Soviet Union would enter the war against Japan. However, even much earlier, because of its resolute action in the war against Hitlerism, the Soviet Union permitted the United States, weakened by the attack on Pearl Harbor, to organize its defense in the Far East. It is easy to imagine the situation in which the United States would have been if forty Soviet divisions had not stood on the borders of Manchuria, tying up considerable Japanese forces. The Soviet Union thus fulfilled its commitments; the same cannot be said as regards the commitments of the western Allies with reference to the date for opening a second front in Europe. The defeat of the Kwantung army definitely decided the fate of Japanese militarism.

The question of the Japanese peace treaty should, as I already said, have been turned over to the Council of Foreign Ministers. The Soviet Union, by demanding the submission of the Japanese treaty to the Council of Foreign Ministers, observed and demanded that others observe the international commitments entered into. However, these commitments involve not only the countries which signed the Potsdam Declaration but also all of the countries which accepted those decisions and which have taken advantage of the rights granted them under those decisions. Some of those countries are represented here in this hall.

One would have to be completely ignorant politically and not have any idea of international documents if one were to accuse the Soviet Union—as did the representative of Ceylon—of trying to keep other interested nations from participating in the preparation of the peace treaty with Japan. One of the grossest arbitrary acts in international relations is the fact that the People's Republic of China was not permitted to participate in deciding the peace treaty. A nation of 500 million which suffered the most and fought the most against the aggression of Japanese militarism, is not represented here. This is a fact which has no precedent in any peace treaty in history. A lawful Government which exercises authority over the entire territory of China, with the exception of the island of Taiwan (Formosa) which is occupied by American troops and where the pitiful remainder of the grafting Kuomintang clique has found refuge, has the indisputable right to express itself on the peace treaty with Japan. The United States has refused to recognize this Government because this Government freed China from colonial oppression, from exploitation by America, and from being an obedient tool of American politics.

The White Book of the Department of State, the author of which is Mr. Acheson, admits that the United States has tried everything in its power to hold back the course of history. However, when it did not succeed, and when the Chinese people finally became the master of their own country, it refused to recognize this fact. But this fact is stronger than any arbitrary decision on the part of the United States Government; it is of historical significance not only for China but for all of Asia, for the entire world.

The drafting of a peace treaty without China is, in fact, the drafting of a document which has nothing in common with peace. We cannot completely grasp all the problems which are tied up with this treaty and take into account the vital problems of the peace in the Far East unless the Chinese people expresses itself on this question. And yet, not only does this treaty fail to recognize the rights of China, but in Article 26 it even contains an attempt to tie China to this treaty. According to this Article Japan may conclude a peace treaty, among others with China, but it must act on the basis of the same principles as the draft of the United States.

No one can deny that the United States is trying, through defeated Japan, to attempt to enforce its will in this matter on a nation of 500 million people, one of the victors of the war. This is a fact which has no precedent. In the name of the Polish Delegation, I express my sharp protest against such methods used here with reference to the great Chinese nation.

We have been told that the draft treaty put before this conference is the result of what has been called "a peace conference of eleven months." It was a strange conference, consisting of the United States corresponding with a number of Governments which were able to express their opinions. The question, however, whether these opinions would find recognition in the provisions of the treaty was decided exclusively by the United States which rejected everything that did not fit its plans for Japan. It is a clear distortion of facts to say that there were conversations with the Soviet Union whose concrete demands regarding this question were entirely ignored. No one can deceive us on this question. This had nothing in common with any conference; these were not negotiations; it was the dictation of the provisions of the treaty which, in some cases, was successful, but in others, for reasons which are easy to understand, did not lead to the desired results.

We know this from our own experience. We received the invitation to San Francisco on July 24 and when we accepted this invitation, the Government of the United States in its note of August 18, began to limit the nature and character of the meeting in San Francisco. My Delegation had not received the August 13 text of the treaty until August 24, the day of departure from Warsaw. Confirmation of the fact that the provisions of the treaty were not agreed upon is apparent from a number of statements made in this hall by the representatives of the countries concerned.

In this manner and by unilateral action the United States is trying to impose a Pax Americana on the Far East. The aim of this American policy regarding the Japanese question was clear from the very beginning. A peace treaty with Japan, and the future of Japan after conclusion of the peace treaty, were to be determined exclusively in accordance with the selfish interests of the United States.

Already in the first American basic document, containing the directives regarding the occupation of Japan, a document signed on September 6, 1945 by Mr. Truman, the President of the United States, and given to General MacArthur for implementation, it is clearly stated that in the case of any divergence of opinion between the Allied Powers regarding occupation policy, the policy of the United States will be decisive. It was decided to include Japan as one of the important positions in the strategic plans of the United States. Japan's importance grew in proportion to the rejection by China of American influence. In Japan the United States decided to apply a modernized and enlarged Monroe Doctrine which rapaciously tries to extend the sphere of American interests to ever new territories in the world. It has been decided that Japan should be included in the American system of bases and territories in which the United States intends to leave its armed forces.

Those plans are not of recent creation. They appeared as factors which, even when military action was in full swing, destroyed collaboration between peoples established during the war against the imperialism and militarism of the Axis. In April 1945, before the opening of the San Francisco Conference which laid the foundation for the United Nations Organization, Admiral King proposed to occupy permanently all of the territories in the Pacific which were occupied by American troops at the end of the war. In May, 1945, in this same city of San Francisco, a sub-committee of one of the committees of the American Senate demanded annexation of all those bases by the United States.

Today we are faced with the fact of the inclusion of Japan into the system of the American aggressive coalition. This system is already in full swing in western Europe. In western Germany, the aims of American policy are served by those who brought Hitler to power. In the Pacific a similar role is being reserved for Japan. The Japanese militaristic circles which prepared and later implemented their plans of conquest are today those who are carrying out the American plans, just as the German chauvinists and militarists are doing. In carefully observing what is happening right now in the Pacific, one must not fail to notice the fact that in the American plans for the Pacific there are found the conceptions which Hitler used even as regards racism. On June 7, 1947, American Admiral William Pratt wrote in Newsweek:

> "It would be a sad commentary on our plans if we were to lose our leading position in Japan . . . Where can we find such a racially clean people, a people as full of virility and as ready for anything as the Japanese people? . . . And in addition we must take into consideration the strategic importance of Japan's position."

The technique of the occupation of Japan served primarily the realization of these aims. The United States did not take into account the recommendations of the Far Eastern Commission which was created so that occupation policy would do justice to the desires of the countries most interested in solving Japanese postwar questions. The United States Government wanted to forget that according to the above mentioned recommendations Japan should be permitted to enter into the family of peaceful nations and should not be turned into some kind of monstrosity.

One of the American specialists on the Far East came to the conclusion that the present American policy in Japan is turning that country into a Frankenstein monster of renewed Japanese militarism, which would hardly be satisfied with fulfilling the role of an American outpost in the Pacific.

The occupation policy of the United States opened to the authors of aggression in Japan the unrestricted possibilities of again coming to power. War criminals were freed in large numbers, officers were released from prison — officers who were members of the secret organizations which oppressed the masses of the people of Japan and pushed it on the road to aggression. The occupation authorities not only have not attempted to democratize Japan's type of government and life, but on the contrary, we have seen the repression of labor unions, democratic parties and the democratic press. At the present moment the Japanese Government, with the help of the United States and Great Britain, is preparing a further curtailment of the organizational activities of Japanese democratic parties.

The decisions of the Far Eastern Commission regarding the decartelization of the Japanese economy were never taken into account and never carried out. The well-known Japanese mopolies were not liquidated. At the time of the publication of the declaration by the occupation powers of an alleged accomplishment of the break-up of monopolies, it became evident that only eleven concerns were broken up. Recommendations were made regarding the structural reorganization of some. The other 325 enterprises remained in the form in which they had existed before Pearl Harbor when they were the main basis of the Japanese war economy and Japan's aggressive policy.

Japanese monopolies have been fully included in production for the rearmament of the United States. All reports from Japan show that Japanese industry is now working for the American war requirements in Korea. They also show that every possibility of trying to reach an armistice in Korea is met by the wealthy classes of Japan with the same kind of panic as by the New York Stock Exchange in the case of similar news. Peace is as horrible to them as to the American monopolists; they try to diminish the chances of peace the same as their financial masters in the United States are doing.

We do not understand at all those who say, as Mr. John Foster Dulles tried to make us believe, that Japan is now entirely different from the earlier Japan, the Japan of 1931, the Japan which attacked China, and the Japan which attacked the United States in 1941. In those days it was considered that Japan in the Nineteenth Century was following in the footsteps of Prussia, following the Wilhelms and Bismarcks of Prussia. To a certain extent that was true. Mr. Dulles assisted in the re-establishment of the German military industry after the First World War, today the author of this peace treaty is rebuilding Japanese militarism. After the First World War, Mr. Dulles was a consultant and counsel to the great German trusts. Now he is defending the Japanese trusts. Germany was defeated in 1918, and after that, with the help of Mr. Dulles and other people, it became the basis for Hitler's aggression; and the same process is being followed right now in regard to Japan in this very peace treaty.

It is in that manner that this peace treaty is dangerous not only to the Asian neighbors of Japan but also for peace in the entire world. I do not mention here that this peace treaty in its present form also creates great danger for the Japanese people themselves and the interests of the Japanese people deserve to be taken into consideration. The Japanese people, after the harsh experience following the last war, wish for peace, want peace. That is proven, as we have said before, by the participation of the Japanese people in actions for peace arranged by the world movement of Defenders of Peace. That is also proven by the petitions of the Japanese people asking for a defense of the Potsdam principle at the conclusion of a peace treaty by all the great countries, and the prevention of the rebuilding of Japanese militarism.

All this is well known to Mr. Dulles. Mr. Dulles received a series of such petitions during his stay in Japan. However, on his return home he remained silent about them. The ideas of the Japanese masses are shown by the manifestations in Tokyo in connection with the present meeting in San Francisco. In those demonstrations the Japanese masses spoke against American dictate. For that reason it is not astonishing that the projects of the peace treaty created under such conditions, being exclusive and unilateral, serving the unilateral purpose of American policy, were criticized even by those countries whose Governments, subdued to the American dictate, declared they will sign the treaty.

From Australia we have heard Mr. Herbert Evatt, former President of the United Nations General Assembly, say "The majority of Australians are certain of the fact that the project of the peace treaty creates a threat, a physical and economic threat to security in the South Pacific and in Southeast Asia. This peace treaty openly and shamelessly is contrary to all the principles of internanational justice." That was said by Mr. Evatt, and it was well known to the men who are gathered here.

We have listened to many of the speeches here, and we could not see in any of them any enthusiasm in regard to the peace treaty written by Mr. Dulles. Some of the speakers want to divert our attention from the substance of problems by resorting to slander against the Soviet Union. One who excelled in slander was the representative of New Zealand.

Our Delegation is certain that if the organizers of this conference succeed in putting this treaty in its present form into effect with the assistance of muzzled procedure, the voices of protest and indignation will increase throughout the world. The Polish Delegation considers, for that reason, that it is necessary to say a few words regarding several parts of this draft treaty.

In the interests of peace we must first change the articles regarding the territorial clauses of the treaty. They should be formulated in such a manner that there should be no lack of clarity, no discrepancy, no obviously intentional omissions to create disputes for the future or to be useful to warmongers. From that point of view it is necessary to state clearly and decisively that Japan recognizes the full sovereignty of China over Manchuria, Taiwan, and the adjacent islands. All wartime agreements between states, and in particular the Cairo, Yalta, and Potsdam Agreements, show clearly what the solution of this problem is. There is no reason why this clear declaration should not become an essential part of the final peace treaty with Japan, and in particular, in admitting the validity of those wartime decisions, the Japanese peace treaty would be reparation, to a certain degree, for the suffering caused the great Chinese people by Japanese aggression. The American dictation to this conference has deprived China of the possibility of participating in our discussions. And this by no means changes the legal rights of the Chinese people to Taiwan, Manchuria and the adjacent islands. The Polish Delegation completely supports the corresponding proposal of the Soviet Delegation relating to Article II of the treaty.

We also consider as correct the amendment of the Soviet Union regarding paragraph C of the same Article, demanding the acceptance by Japan of the sovereignty of the USSR over the southern part of the Island of Sakhalin and all adjacent islands and also over the Kurile Islands. The agreement of Yalta provides in this regard an entirely clear formulation and states that those requirements and demands of the Soviet Union must be satisfied without contention after victory over Japan.

Article 3 of the treaty in the draft by Mr. Dulles, which American propaganda tries to present to the world as being the safeguard of the Japanese people, takes from Japan a group of islands — Ryukyu, Bonin, etc., in order to transfer them to the permanent ownership of the United States. The creation of a trusteeship does not change the predatory character of American plans. The organization of a trusteeship over a sovereign part of Japan means the same thing as reducing it to the role of a colony because in accordance with Article 76b of the United Nations Charter, the purpose of the trusteeship system is to help the population of territories which are incapable of independent administration. From the draft treaty it follows that the United States considers Japan to be too immature to exercise sovereign power in these territories. But it is a known fact that in this case the United States has in mind not trusteeship but annexation. As an example, it suffices to cite the Bonin Islands of which the United States tried to take possession and to which it laid claim before 1873.

The islands enumerated in Article 3 have always belonged to Japan historically and must not be taken away from her. Therefore, the proposal of the Soviet Union with regard to this Article is correct in demanding the recognition of Japanese sovereignty not only for the islands of Honshu, Kyushu, Shikoku, and Hokkaido but also the Ryukyu, Bonin, Rosario, Volcano, Pares Vela, Marcus, Tsushima islands, and others.

We are not surprised that, Mr. Dulles, the "architect" of this treaty, as he was designated in this hall, did not include in his draft any provision capable of successfully preventing the revival of Japanese militarism. This would contradict the basic American conception of converting Japan into a military base occupied by American troops.

Therefore, it becomes necessary in the first place to include in the treaty basic provisions on the democratization of Japan to prevent the clique of military adventurers from violating the basic rights of the population. We therefore support the proposal of the Soviet Delegation to include new articles in the draft treaty. The first of these is intended to impose upon Japan the obligation to remove all obstacles to the development and strengthening of democratic tendencies, and likewise to insure for the Japanese people complete equality and civil liberties. The second, like the conditions provided for in the peace treaties which have already gone into effect since the Second World War, is intended to prevent the revival on Japanese territory of all possible fascist and militarist organizations.

In this same Chapter of the treaty there should be included a new article guaranteeing to the Japanese people freedom of economic and social development. We are therefore in agreement with the Delegation of the Soviet Union that it is necessary to include in the treaty a new article to preclude any kind of restrictions on peaceful industry, the development of trade with other countries, or access to raw materials in accordance with the needs of the peacetime economy of Japan. This likewise applies to the elimination of any kind of restriction on the development of the merchant fleet and the construction of merchant vessels.

The American occupation authorities on Japanese territory have undertaken to form a new Japanese army, although detachments of the Japanese police have the same role as was played by the Versailles Reichswehr. Mr. Dulles, author of the draft treaty, is just as favorable to the cadres of the new Japanese army as he was at one time to the Reichswehr out of which Hitler's Wehrmacht grew. Poland, which endured such heavy sacrifices during the last war, can do no less than protest most decisively and categorically against omission from the draft of the Japanese treaty paragraphs limiting the size of the armed forces of post-war Japan. Therefore, we consider fully and completely justified the Soviet proposal to include in Chapter III a number of new articles restricting the size of the Japanese armed forces and forbidding Japan to have, manufacture, or experiment on various types of special weapons, such as atomic, bacteriological, and special weapons.

We likewise support the Soviet proposal forbidding Japan to conclude any kind of military alliances or to join coalitions directed against any state whose armed forces took part in the last war against Japan.

We have already mentioned the role assigned to Japan by the authors of the treaty in the system of American military alliances. These alliances in the Pacific and the Far East are as obviously directed against the Soviet Union and China as in Europe they are directed against the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia, Poland, and the other People's Democracies. Therefore, it is impossible to expect us to accede silently to the agenda which draws Japan once again into a conspiracy against nations without whose heroic resistance and relentless struggle Hitler, Mussolini, and Tojo would still be ruling over nations which they conquered.

Desiring to protect themselves from the consequences of this policy of preparation for war, we also demand the inclusion in the peace treaty of a paragraph on the necessity for the withdrawal of occupation forces from Japan within a period not exceeding ninety days from the coming into force of the treaty of peace.

Only the withdrawal of the occupation troops with the simultaneous coming into force of all conditions of the treaty, which we mentioned above, will make it possible for Japan to set out on the road to peaceful cooperation with other nations on the basis of sovereign equality. Japan is not threatened with attack by her closest neighbors. The efforts of the most powerful neighbors of Japan, the Soviet Union and China, have been directed toward the peaceful development of that territory and the systematic improvement of the living standards of the population. Japan is threatened only by the policy of preparation for war which at the present time is being promoted on its territory by the American occupation troops.

Among the provisions of the treaty which caused the strongest general objections are the draft paragraphs relating to reparations. It seems proper to us that the problem of reparations, hitherto insufficiently developed, should be submitted for consideration to a special conference of the states concerned. The proposal of the Soviet Delegation on changing the corresponding paragraphs of Article 14 seems from our point of view to be fully advisable, and the Polish Delegation supports it fully and completely.

We bring these observations and considerations of ours to the attention of the representatives of the states assembled here. It is not our fault and we are not responsible for the fact that there was no deep and honest exchange of opinions here—the basic element of every international conference. It is with others and not with us that the responsibility lies for the fact that the representatives of 850 million inhabitants of Asia, nearly 80 per cent of the population of that continent, were absent from this hall during the discussion of such important Far Eastern problems.

Any separate peace treaty with Japan must bear the stigma about which Chou En-lai, Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Central Government of the Chinese People's Republic, spoke on August 15, 1951:

> "The American-British draft peace treaty with Japan completely violates international agreements, infringes upon the interests of the Allied powers which took part in the war with Japan, is hostile to China and the Soviet Union; it signifies a threat to the peoples of Asia, violates peace and security throughout the world and will be detrimental to the interests of the Japanese people."

At the conclusion of the conference in San Francisco, Mr. Wierblowski made the following statement to the press:

THE Polish Delegation arrived at San Francisco convinced that it would be able to discuss the question of the treaty in a concrete and constructive manner with the representatives of various states who had gathered here. We hoped it would be a truly international conference.

It transpired, however, that it was intended to be a mere formality. Because China was not admitted, this conference was deprived of the representation of the greatest nation of Asia. This fact, as well as the absence of India and Burma from the conference, created a situation where the representatives of 850 million inhabitants of Asia, that is more than 80 per cent of the total population of that continent, were unable to express their views on peace in the Far East.

The majority of those who participated in the discussions seriously questioned the provisions of the treaty. It was clear, however, that the United States was determined to impose its treaty upon all other nations. The treaty dictated by the Americans was to be signed in defiance of the binding obligations and established principles of procedure for international conferences. The United States, arbitrarily annexing a part of Japanese territory, was determined to continue the occupation, transforming Japan into a war base. It was allowing Japanese militarism to be revived and it dominated that country economically. It violated the rights of the Soviet Union and China.

The speech delivered by Mr. Yoshida demonstrated the attitude of the present Japanese Government toward those victorious in the last war. The American nation should consider seriously the hidden meaning behind his speech.

The Polish nation has paid a high price for the policy of those who helped fascism to power. That is why we have the right to warn others and we refuse to take responsibility for their mistakes. The separatist document signed in San Francisco constitutes a further step in United States' policy hostile to peace. This has been expressed first of all by the fact that no amendments made by the Soviet Union — the main pillar of victory over fascism — have been taken into account, and that the draft contrived by Mr. Dulles has been endorsed without the slightest opposition. It has been too soon forgotten that civilization has been saved from annihilation by the sacrifice of the blood and lives of millions of Soviet soldiers. Because of these sacrifices your cities remained untouched, you escaped air raids and destruction, and your casualties were considerably lower.

In expressing our thanks to the city of San Francisco for its hospitality, we express at the same time our regret that in this city, which has become the symbol of the United Nations Charter, a document has been signed which makes for further international tension.
