EXCHANGE OF MEMORANDA WITH U.S.S.R.

Soviet Memorandum of June 10

Following is an unofficial English translation of the Soviet memorandum concerning a Japanese Peace Treaty which was handed the American Ambassador at Moscow on June 10:

The Government of the U.S.S.R. received from the Government of the United States of America on May 19, 1951, a memorandum representing an answer to the "remarks of the Government of the U.S.S.R. on the United States of America draft peace treaty with Japan" of May 7, 1951.

The Soviet Government takes notice of the statement of the Government of the United States that it, having examined the remarks of the Government of the Soviet Union on the memorandum of the Government of the United States of America of March 29, 1951, considers that the divergencies which exist between the views of the Government of the U.S.S.R. and the peace terms set forth in the American March draft are not so great as to prevent achievement of agreement on a peace treaty.

Inasmuch, however, as along with the statement mentioned, considerations respecting the "remarks of the Government of the U.S.S.R. on the United States of America draft peace treaty with Japan" of May as set forth in the American memorandum of May 19 which give an interpretation that is incorrect and that in several instances distorts the meaning of these remarks, the Soviet Government for the purpose of introducing full clarity considers it necessary to state the following:

1. Concerning basic positions in American draft peace treaty with Japan.

(a) For the Soviet Union as well as for other countries interested in a guarantee of lasting peace in the Far East question that Japan not become an aggressive state again and that revival of Japanese militarism be prevented possesses most important significance.

As is known, little more than 10 years ago a militaristic Japan attacked the Soviet Union in the region of Vladivostok. In the course of 15 years Japanese imperialism, invading China, harassed the Chinese people causing them great hardships. Japanese imperialists did not stop at attacking the United States and later a whole series of states in Asia including India, which unleashed war in the entire Far East.

Is there in the American draft peace treaty with Japan a guarantee against the rebirth of Japan as an aggressive state? Acquaintance with this draft shows that it does not possess any guarantee in this respect.

In connection with this it was stated in the "remarks of the Soviet Government on the U.S.A. draft peace treaty with Japan" that the "American draft not only does not contain guarantees against the restoration of Japanese militarism, but in general does not set forth any limitations with respect to the size of the armed forces of Japan," as was done, for example, in the peace treaty with Italy, although there is no basis for such a privileged position for Japan in comparison with Italy.

Having no possibility of refuting this assertion of the Soviet Government, the Government of the United States of America in its statements on this question in its memorandum of May 19 falls into patent contradiction. On the one hand, in this memorandum it states that allegedly no agreements "exist in reality" between the powers on the question of demilitarization of Japan "except decisions concerning the period of occupation." However, on the other hand, the Government of the United States of America refers here to the Potsdam declaration of the Four Powers concerning the situation of Japan, whereas the basic purpose of the occupation of Japan is set forth there as the task of obtaining "convincing proof that the capacity of Japan to wage war has been destroyed," which refers, as is obvious, not only to the period of occupation but also to the subsequent period.

Furthermore, there exists directives of the Far Eastern Commission, which as early as June 19, 1947, took an important decision, contained in its document Basic Policy with Respect to Japan After its Capitulation. In this basic document of the Far Eastern Commission adopted with the participation of representatives of Australia, Canada, China, France, India, Holland, New Zealand, the Philippines, U.S.S.R., England, and the United States of America, the task was placed in the forefront:

> Of accomplishing the physical and spiritual demilitarization of Japan by means of the execution of a series of measures requiring the establishment of a period of strict control, including complete disarmament, the carrying out of economic reform the purpose of which would be to deprive Japan of the possibility of waging war, the eradication of militaristic influences and carrying out of strict justice with respect to war criminals.

Naturally, this decision also concerns not only the period of occupation.

After the facts cited, it becomes clear how far from reality is the assertion of the Government of the United States of America that allegedly no agreements "exists in reality" between the powers with respect to the demilitarization of Japan "except decisions concerning the period of occupation."

After the facts cited, it cannot be denied that, inasmuch as no limitations on the armed forces of Japan are contained in the American draft, there are no guarantees there against the restoration of Japanese militarism and the possibility of repetition of Japanese aggression. It is clear that no state that experienced the aggressive attack of Japan and is interested in the guarantee of lasting peace in the Far East can agree with such a position.

Together with this, the Government of the United States of America, with the help of its occupation authorities, is in reality already carrying out a policy of restoring Japanese militarism. This is evident from the fact that the American occupation authorities are not only not taking measures for the liquidation of military bases in Japan but, on the contrary, are trying to expand them considerably, modernize, and utilize them for aggressive purposes. In Japan they have already begun the recreation of a land army and of naval and air fleets; are restoring and expanding the work of former Japanese military arsenals and military enterprises; are freeing Japanese war criminals; are restoring military organizations, and more and more promoting propaganda of war; and are elevating the role and influence of the supporters of the rebirth of militarism in the governmental apparatus. Moreover, the United States, as the Government of the United States of America basically admits itself in its memorandum of May 19, has already begun the utilization of the industrial and human resources of Japan for its military intervention in Korea which is being carried out illegally under the flag of the United Nations organization.

The draft peace treaty of the United States of America, as well as the policy carried out by the American occupation authorities in Japan, testify to the fact that the Government of the United States of America is not observing obligations it took upon itself in international agreements not to allow the rebirth of Japanese militarism. In essence, the American draft peace treaty with Japan, and likewise the memorandum of the United States of America of May 19 pursue not the peaceful purposes of prevention of a repetition of Japanese aggression but the aggressive purposes of reestablishment of Japanese militarism.

No guarantees are contained in the American draft peace treaty with Japan for assuring the future security of countries which suffered from the aggression of militaristic Japan, although it is clear to anyone that this should be one of the main tasks of the peace treaty. Instead of this it is especially stipulated in the draft that Japan should be accorded the opportunity to make "a contribution toward assurance of its own security," which allegedly corresponds to the "right to individual and collective self defense" provided for member countries of the United Nations in the United Nations Charter.

This question is even more frankly discussed in the memorandum of the United States of America of May 19. In this memorandum it is stated that the Government of the United States of America intends "to enter into an agreement concerning security with Japan for the period after the conclusion of the treaty," i. e. the conclusion of a military agreement between the United States of America and Japan is envisaged.

From this it follows that the task of not permitting the rebirth of Japanese militarism and guaranteeing in the future the security of countries that suffered from Japanese aggression is being replaced by the Government of the United States of America by the conclusion of a military agreement with Japan which would push Japan even more toward the restoration of militarism. Inasmuch as it is perfectly obvious that such countries as the Chinese People's Republic and the Soviet Union are excluded from participation in this military agreement of the United States of America with Japan, there can be no doubt that this military agreement of the United States of America with Japan is directed primarily against these very states and possesses an obvious aggressive character.

After this it becomes clear that all references to the Charter of the United Nations, to the "right to individual and collective self-defense" in this case obviously have no substance and are false throughout.

It is likewise not necessary to prove that the references of the American memorandum also to the statement of J. V. Stalin, made on March 10, 1939, on the matter of struggle with aggression and the collective security of peaceloving countries are not only completely inappropriate here but are also hypocritical.

Thus, the memorandum of the United States of America of May 19 shows that the American draft peace treaty with Japan not only did not provide guarantees against the rebirth of Japanese militarism which has caused such hardships for peaceloving peoples but, on the contrary, pushes Japan on the path of aggression that has already led the Japanese Government to the verge of ruin, and consequently fundamentally runs counter to the interests of guaranteeing lasting peace in the Far East, as well as to the national interests of Japan itself.

(b) Concerning Termination of the Occupation of Japan and Withdrawal of Foreign Troops from Japanese Territory.

In its comments of May 7, the Soviet Government proposed that precise mention be made in the treaty that "after conclusion of the peace treaty with Japan all occupation troops should be withdrawn from Japanese territory within not more than one year and that no foreign states should have troops or military bases in Japan."

As is known, in the peace treaty with Italy, as well as with other peace treaties with European countries, it is specifically mentioned that the occupation should be terminated in the shortest possible time and in any event not more than 90 days from the date of the entry of the peace treaty into force. However, in the American draft peace treaty with Japan no time limit is mentioned for the withdrawal of occupation forces from Japan. The vague statement contained in the memorandum of the United States of America of May 19 that the "occupation will cease with the entry of the treaty into force" without mention of any time limit for withdrawal of the occupation troops can only lead to confusion; all the more since it is evident from this memorandum that the United States of America in reality does not intend to withdraw its troops even after the conclusion of the peace treaty but intends to leave its armed forces in Japan, allegedly "not as occupation troops."

In refusing to set a time limit for the withdrawal of the occupation troops from Japanese territory, the Government of the United States of America breaks one of its important obligations under international agreements. Leaving foreign troops in Japan after conclusion of a peace treaty, under whatever pretext it is done, contradicts the Potsdam declaration of July 26, 1945, which provides for the withdrawal of foreign troops from Japan and signifies camouflaged prolongation of the occupation of Japan for an indefinite protracted period.

In intending to prolong the occupation even after the conclusion of the peace treaty, the Government of the United States of America is thus aspiring to remain the real master in Japan for a long time. In such a situation, the Government of the United States of America can count on the preservation of those privileges which it has guaranteed for itself during the years of occupation, it can count on prolongation of the political and economic dependence of Japan on the United States of America and can count not only on the retention but even on the further expansion of its military bases on Japan. It is clear that all this can only harm the course of peaceful settlement with Japan and the strengthening of peace in the Far East.

Therefore it is necessary that in the peace treaty with Japan the time limit for withdrawal of occupation troops from Japanese territory be precisely fixed and that in this treaty it should be established that no foreign state should have troops or military bases in Japan.

(c) Concerning the Inadmissibility of Participation by Japan in a Coalition Against States Having an Interest in Signing a Peace Treaty with Her.

In connection with what has been set forth, it becomes clear why the Government of the United States of America does not agree in its memorandum with the proposal of the Soviet Union to oblige Japan not to enter into a coalition directed against any state having an interest in signing a peace treaty with Japan. The reference of the Government of the United States of America to the fact that Japan should, in conformity with article 2 of the United Nations Charter refrain from aggression or from application of force against the territorial integrity of political independence of any state is obviously without substance. Experience has shown that the Government of the United States utilizes the political and economic dependence of other United Nations member states (first of all—participants in the North Atlantic Union and the Latin American Republics) in order to transform the United Nation into a weapon for unleasing aggressive war in the Far East. The reference to article 2 of the United Nations Charter in the memorandum of the Government of the United States of America, and also in article 6 in the American draft peace treaty was calculated on utilization of Japan as well for this purpose.

Besides, it is not difficult to understand that the proposal of the Soviet Government concerning the nonparticipation of Japan in a coalition acquires important and immediate significance on the strength of possible military agreement of the United States of America with Japan.

(d) Concerning the Removal of Limitations From the Peaceful Economy of Japan and From the Trade of Japan with Other Countries.

The memorandum of the United States of America of May 19 bypasses the question of the peacetime economy of Japan being placed in servile dependence on the United States of America as the result of all kinds of limitations with respect to the Japanese peacetime economy and the establishment of privileges for American firms sponsored by American occupation authorities. Japan is deprived of the opportunity of engaging in normal trade with neighboring states, which still further harms prospects for the upsurge of Japanese national economy.

The Soviet Government considers that without the effective removal of these restrictions imposed from outside, it would be impossible to create conditions for the upsurge of a peaceful economy and for improving the life of the Japanese people.

Judging from the memorandum of the United States of America of March 19 everything essential has already been achieved with respect to the democratization of Japan. But this is wholly untrue. In fact, in Japan, police suppression of organs of the democratic press, repressions against trade unions and other democratic organizations and persecutions for political convictions are being fully revived, with the cooperation of the occupation authorities, and a return to the prewar fascist order in Japan when the shameful law on the struggle against "dangerous thoughts" existed, is taking place.

All this confirms the necessity for adopting those proposals concerning the democratization of Japan which were put forward in the comments of the Soviet Government.

(f) Concerning Fulfillment of the Cairo Declaration, the Potsdam Declaration and the Yalta Agreement With Regard to the Territorial Questions.

As far as the territorial questions are concerned, the Soviet Government proposes only one thing—guarantee of the honorable fulfilment of the international agreements mentioned above, under which stands the signature of the United States of America itself.

As is known, it is stated in the Cairo declaration that the island of Taiwan and the Pescadores Islands should be returned to the Chinese Republic. Inasmuch as the Chinese Republic has been transformed into the Chinese People's Republic and only the Chinese People's Republic expresses the will of the Chinese people, it is clearly obvious that Taiwan and the Pescadores Islands should be transferred to the Chinese People's Republic. In the contrary event the Cairo Agreement will not be fulfilled and the entire responsibility for this would fall on the Government of the United States of America.

As far as the Ryukyu, Bonin, Rosario, Volcano, Pares Vela, and Marcus Islands are concerned, the memorandum of the United States of America of May 19 contains nothing which would require fresh confirmation on the part of the Soviet Government of what was set forth in the comments of the Soviet Government of May 7.

In the memorandum of the Government of the United States of America of May 19 it is stated: "In view of the known fact of the acquisition by the U.S.S.R. of zones of interest in Manchuria, the Government of the United States of America hastens to inquire the significance of the desire of the Soviet government to avoid references to the return of Manchuria". The Soviet Government considers it necessary to state in this respect that the U.S.S.R. does not possess any zones of interest in Manchuria, and as is known to all considers Manchuria as an inseparable part of the Chinese People's Republic. In view of this the above-mentioned statement of the American memorandum must be held as deplorable fabrications of idle people and malicious slander of the U. S. S. R.

It cannot be unknown to the Government of the United States of America that the Soviet Union after defeating the Japanese Kwantung army liberated Manchuria and returned it to the lawful authority of the Chinese people. As far as the rights to the naval base of Port Arthur and to the Chinese-Changchun railway, which were granted to the Soviet Union according to the Yalta agreement and the Sino-Soviet agreement of August 14, 1945, are concerned, the Soviet Government voluntarily and without compensation renounced these rights in favor of the Chinese People's Republic. Appropriate agreements concluded in Moscow on February 14, 1950, were published at the time and of course are known to the Government of the United States of America.

According to this agreement the Soviet Union, as is known, is to liquidate not later than 1952 its naval base at Port Arthur and withdraw its troops thence.

According to the opinion of the Soviet Government it would be much better if the Government of the United States of America would refrain from slander of the U.S.S.R. on the subject of Manchuria and concern itself with the withdrawal of its armed forces from Taiwan and the Pescadores Islands and return these illegally seized territories to their lawful owner—the Chinese People's Republic.

In the memorandum of the Government of the United States of America of May 19 it was also stated that the Soviet Government allegedly "in violation of the surrender terms is delaying the return of approximately 200,000 Japanese soldiers to their homes and peacetime life."

There can be no doubt that the Government of the United States of America itself does not attach any credence to this statement. The Soviet Government considers it necessary to recall that as early as April 22, 1950, the official report of the termination of repatriation of Japanese war prisoners from the Soviet Union was published, which, as were subsequent communications on this matter, were brought to the notice of the powers. In the report mentioned above it was pointed out that only 1,487 Japanese war prisoners, convicted and undergoing investigation for military crimes committed by them, 9 Japanese war prisoners subject to repatriation after the completion of medical treatment, and 971 Japanese war prisoners who had committed serious crimes against the Chinese people and would be transferred to the jurisdiction of the Chinese People's Republic, remained unrepatriated.

Consequently, the assertion in the memorandum of the United States of America that the Soviet Government is delaying the return to their homeland of approximately 200,000 Japanese soldiers is a trifling slanderous attack and strikes only slanderers.

As far as the remarks in the memorandum of the United States of America that the Soviet Union participated only 6 days in the war with Japan and that the role of the military efforts of the Soviet Union in this war were allegedly insignificant are concerned, the Soviet Union considers it necessary to state the following: first, the Soviet Union entered the war with Japan exactly at the time fixed at the Yalta conference without any delay whatever. Secondly, the Soviet Army fought a bloody engagement with Japanese troops not for 6 days but in the course of a month, since the Kwantung army continued resistance for a long time in spite of the imperial declaration of capitulation. Thirdly, the Soviet Army smashed 22 Japanese divisions in Manchuria—the main forces of the Japanese Kwantung army, and took about 600,000 Japanese soldiers and officers prisoner. Fourthly, Japan came to capitulation only after the first decisive blow of Soviet troops at the Kwantung army. Fifthly, even before the entry of the U. S. S. R. into the war with Japan, during 1941–45, the U. S. S. R. kept up to 40 divisions on the frontiers with Manchuria and tied up the whole Kwantung army, thus facilitating the operations of China and the United States of America in the war against the Japanese militarists.

All these facts are, of course, known to the Government of the United States of America, and if, despite these facts, the Government of the United States of America permits itself to minimize the leading role of the Soviet Union in the matter of the defeat of Japanese militarism, this can only be explained by the fact that the Government of the United States of America does not have any convincing arguments, in view of which it is obliged in this case to resort to slanderous fabrications against the U. S. S. R.

2. Concerning Preparation of an Over-all Peace Treaty with Japan instead of a Separate Treaty.

In addition to the comments on the draft treaty made above, the Soviet Government has in view the expressing of other remarks on the substance of this draft when the meeting of interested countries takes place.

(a) In its memorandum of May 19 the Government of the United States of America has refrained from answering the comments of the Soviet Government where the text of the Potsdam Agreement was cited, from which it is evident that the Council of Foreign Ministers is set up with a composition of the Five Powers—United States of America, U. S. S. R., China, Great Britain, and France—first of all for "preparatory work on a peace settlement" and that in the drafting of the corresponding peace treaties "the Council will consist of members representing those states which have signed surrender terms dictated to that enemy state which the given task concerns."

In the meantime, the references to the Potsdam Agreement cited furnish the basis for drawing the following indisputable conclusions:

First, in setting up the Council of Foreign Ministers composed of the Five Powers, "preparatory work on a peace settlement" was directly mentioned as its main task, moreover the peace settlement was not limited to Europe;

Secondly, the Council of Foreign Ministers should engage on its preparatory work on a peace settlement with a composition of members "representing those states which have signed capitulation terms," from which it follows that the preparation of a peace treaty with Japan is placed upon four countries—the United States of America, U.S.S.R., Great Britain, and China, which signed the Japanese surrender document.

Consequently, fulfillment of the Potsdam Agreement with respect to preparation of a peace treaty with Japan requires the calling of the Council of Foreign Ministers composed of representatives of the United States of America, U.S.S.R., Great Britain, and China and objection to this on the part of the Government of the United States of America is without grounds.

The unfounded nature of the objections against calling a Council of Foreign Ministers for such reasons as that it could allegedly delay preparations of a peace treaty with Japan is likewise perfectly obvious. These objections have already been put forth for several years past and they have led only to dragging out the matter. Meanwhile preparation of the treaty could already have been finished during this time, and the treaty could have been signed, as took place duly with the peace treaties of five other states—Italy, Bulgaria, Rumania, Hungary, and Finland, which were prepared by the Council of Foreign Ministers.

The statement that the procedure of the Council would accord a "secondary role" to some allied states is also without substance. It is sufficient to point out that under the procedure being imposed by the Government of the United States of America all allied states are in reality excluded from preparation of the treaty since the Government of the United States of America has gone along the path of seizing this matter exclusively into its own hands.

(b) In its remarks of May 7 the Soviet Government emphasized the inadmissibility of excluding China from the preparation of a peace treaty with Japan. These Chinese people were obliged to wage a long and heavy war with militaristic Japan, which had invaded its territory, and bore uniquely great sacrifices in this struggle, and therefore the government of the Chinese People's Republic as the sole legal expression of will of the Chinese people cannot be excluded from preparation of a treaty which should serve to establish lasting peace in the Far East. The statement of the government of the Chinese People's Republic of May 22, 1951, confirms its legal right and unique interest in the preparation of the treaty, which other states cannot ignore.

In the meantime the American draft treaty and the memorandum of the United States of America of May 19 testify to the fact that the Government of the United States of America is going on with direct violation of the national rights of China with respect to its territory in refusing to fulfill the Cairo agreement regarding the return of Taiwan island and the Pescadores Islands to China, as well as with exclusion of China from preparation of a peace treaty with Japan.

In rejecting the established procedure for preparation of peace treaties, the Government of the United States of America is endeavoring to exclude the Chinese People's Republic and the Soviet Union and also other interested countries from preparation of the treaty and, ignoring their legal rights and interests, intends to dictate terms of treaty to Japan in accordance with its own judgment, inasmuch as the Japanese Government, which is dependent upon American occupation authorities, is prepared to enter into such an arrangement with the United States of America.

All this speaks for the fact that the Government of the United States of America does not want Japan to have a peace treaty with all the states that were in a state of war with her. Instead of an over-all peace treaty the United States of America wants to impose upon Japan a separate peace treaty with the Government of the United States of America and its satellites.

It cannot be considered accidental that the Government of the United States of America does not want an over-all peace treaty with Japan, but aspires to a separate treaty. Only with conclusion of a separate treaty can the United States of America secure the dependence of Japan for several years hence, and inasmuch as the conclusion of a military agreement between the United States of America and Japan is also envisaged by the draft treaty it becomes clear that the goal of the separate treaty is the transformation of Japan into a shameful weapon for carrying out the aggressive plans of the United States of America in the Far East.

If the Government of the United States of America does not desist from its intention to exclude the Soviet Union and Chinese People's Republic from the preparation of a peace treaty with Japan and imposes a separate peace treaty on Japan, this will signify, first, that the United States has taken the path of gross violations of its international obligations, including the United Nations Declaration of Jan. 1, 1942, which imposes the obligation not to conclude a separate peace, and, secondly, that the present policy of the United States of America will lead not to restoration and strengthening of peace in the Far East but to the creation of a new aggressive grouping in the Pacific Ocean.

Responsibility for the consequences of such a policy will lie entirely on the Government of the United States of America.

(c) As far as the repeated statement of the Government of the United States of America that negotiations concerning the draft peace treaty with Japan took place between representatives of the U.S.S.R. and United States of America is concerned, the Soviet Government is obliged again to emphasize that there have not been and could not be any negotiations concerning the working out of a draft peace treaty, since the Government of the U.S.S.R. has stood and does stand against any form of separate negotiations on this question. Of course, personal meetings have taken place between Jacob A. Malik and Dulles at the personal request of Dulles, as have also the transmittal by Dulles of his ideas concerning a peace treaty with Japan and the posing of questions by Malik for clarification of Dulles' views. However, it would be absolutely incorrect to consider such personal meetings as negotiations between the U.S.S.R. and the United States of America concerning the working out of a peace treaty with Japan.

3. Fully confirming its proposals of May 7, the Soviet Government insists on the following basic principles with respect to a peace treaty with Japan.

First. The peace treaty with Japan should be over-all and not separate, for which purpose no country participating in the war with Japan should be excluded from the preparation and signing of the treaty.

Second. The peace treaty with Japan should be worked out on the basis of the Cairo declaration, the Potsdam declaration and the Yalta Agreement.

Third. A peace conference of representatives of all states which participated with their armed forces in the war with Japan should be called in July or August, 1951, for consideration of the available drafts for a peace treaty with Japan.

U.S. Memorandum of July 9

[Released to the press July 14]

Following is the text of a memorandum delivered to the Soviet Embassy at Washington on July 9, 1951, in response to the Soviet Memorandum of June 10 concerning a Japanese Peace treaty.

The Department of State, having transmitted to the Embassy of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in Washington a revised (July 3, 1951) draft of a prospective Treaty of Peace with Japan, takes this occasion to allude to the memorandum of the Government of the Soviet Union of June 10, 1951, dealing with the earlier draft of March 29, 1951.

Section 1 of that memorandum dealt with the substantive terms of that draft. It failed to cite any language of the draft as objectionable. In essence, the Soviet memorandum objected not to anything contained in the draft treaty but because the treaty would not restrict Japan with respect to the right of individual or collective self-defense, a right recognized by the United Nations Charter as "inherent." The Government of the Soviet Union would have the peace treaty deny to Japan the right hereafter to enter into collective security arrangements with other countries of its choosing. This is a viewpoint which the Government of the United States cannot accept.

Section 2 of the Soviet memorandum dealt with procedure. It again "insists on observance of the Potsdam Agreement" which, according to the Government of the Soviet Union, means that "preparation of a peace treaty with Japan is placed upon four countries—the United States of America, U.S.S.R., Great Britain, and China" constituting the Council of Foreign Ministers.

This would commit the preparation of the treaty to the veto-bound processes of that Council and would exclude from the preparatory work France and many Pacific and Asiatic countries which bore a far heavier burden in the Japanese war than did the Soviet Union.

The Soviet Government's memorandum does not attempt any reasoned reply to the analysis of the Potsdam Agreement contained in Section I of the United States aide memoire of May 19, which proves irrefutably that the Potsdam Agreement between the United Kingdom, the Soviet Union and the United States neither mentions nor relates in any way to the Japanese peace, probably because the Potsdam Agreement was made on August 1, 1945, before Japan's surrender and when the Soviet Union was still a neutral in the Pacific war.

In the concluding Section 3 of its memorandum of June 10, 1951, the Soviet Government says that the "peace treaty with Japan should be multilateral and not separate" both as to preparation and as to signing.

The July 3, 1951, draft reflects the operation of those very principles. Many interested nations have participated in its preparation. The fact that they have done so through diplomatic channels makes their participation no less real than if they had participated in some other manner. The terms of the treaty would recognize and protect equally the legitimate interests of each and every state which took part in the Japanese war. At the same time the terms embody not merely the formality of peace, but the spirit of peace. The Government of the Soviet Union will further observe that, as it desires, the text is prepared as a multilateral instrument.

The Soviet Memorandum, after having first demanded that the preparation of a draft treaty should now be started over again by the Council of Foreign Ministers, suggests, in its final paragraph, that when there are available drafts, there should be a conference of all active belligerents in the Japanese war, for consideration of these drafts.

The Government of the United States anticipates that there will be a general conference early in September to conclude a peace on the basis of the draft of July 3, 1951. It will welcome participation in that conference, and adherence to the resultant Treaty, by the Government of the Soviet Union.

U.S.S.R. Fails To Inform Soviet Peoples of Friendship Resolution

(Released to the press July 11)

The Voice of America today began calling to the attention of the Soviet Government its failure to transmit the McMahon-Russell Friendship Resolution to the Soviet people.

For the past several days the Voice of America will stress in all Russian language programs the number of days that have elapsed since July 7, when President Truman forwarded the Friendship Resolution to the President of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet.

The first of this series of basic scripts follows:

TRUMAN MESSAGE NOT PUBLISHED IN U.S.S.R.

Good Evening. This is _____. On July 7, President Truman sent a message to His Excellency Nikolai Mikhailovich Shvernik, President of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. It was a simple request. That those who lead the Soviet Union transmit to the people of the Soviet Union, a resolution passed by the elected representatives of the American people, the Congress, expressing to them the feeling of friendship. To date, there is no evidence that the President's request has been complied with.

The Resolution of Friendship has appeared in no Soviet newspaper. It has not been heard on any Soviet radio, and has any Soviet press writer stepped to the footlights to read it to his audience. Of course, there may be a delay—papers, letters, books, anything of all kinds have to go through a great many hands in the Soviet Union before seeing the light of day. Or, perhaps, it is being studied as the diplomats say but what there is to study about a simple expression of friendship from the common people is difficult to understand. Or, perhaps, the Resolution itself isn't phrased correctly—after all, phraseology in the Soviet Union is a special science—but then it would be such a simple matter just to telephone Washington and ask for the definition or meaning of any word. For instance, if there's any difficulty with the American word "friendship" the word "comradeship" could be substituted. If it is difficult to translate out of Western [illegible] there are different sentences—for instance King is right at hand, and he is an excellent precedent.

But if it is some of these things—the acquaintance of the American people's greetings to any Soviet radio, the listening of the President's simple request to signal early attempt, and we must look elsewhere for the reason. Perhaps it is in the body, the actual words, in the Resolution itself.

You are a special note. "The desire and of America is to join with all other nations in preserving the dignity of man, and in observing those basic principles which alone lead mankind to live existence."

Now, what could be in there that wouldn't translate? I'm sure there are Russian phrases equivalent to "the dignity of man" and for "moral principles." If not in the new rapidly changing Soviet language, then back a little in the old Russian. And there would be enough citizens who still understand the old phrases to be able to convey their meaning to the younger folk.

What else is in the Resolution? Oh yes—that "the American people offer to share all that is good in atomic energy, asking in return only safeguards against the evil in the atom." That would translate. I'm sure, for everybody in the new Russian after all, the atom is much younger than the Soviet Union itself. So they could
