HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JANUARY 17, 1952

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou merciful benefactor, we are again invoking the blessings of Thy grace and favor upon ourselves, upon our beloved country, and all mankind.

May the American way of life, which we prize so highly, not merely be one of conformity to a code of laws but may we view it as a patriotic devotion to those lofty ideals and principles which Thou hast ordained.

Grant that the day may be hastened when there shall be less need of laws and regulations and restraints and man shall recognize and respect the sanctity of the duty and privilege of self-control and self-government and voluntary obedience.

Show us how we may inspire humanity to cultivate a more sacred regard for the moral and spiritual capacities and instincts with which we have been created.

Help us to feel the romance of goodness and righteousness and to exalt and enthrone in our hearts the virtues of honesty, loyalty, fidelity, and justice.

Hear us in Christ's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RECESS

The SPEAKER. The House will stand in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

Thereupon (at 12 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES OF CONGRESS TO HEAR AN ADDRESS BY THE RIGHT HONORABLE WINSTON CHURCHILL, PRIME MINISTER OF GREAT BRITAIN

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives presided.

At 12 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m., the Doorkeeper announced the Vice President and the Members of the United States Senate.

The Senate, preceded by the Vice President and its Secretary and Sergeant at Arms, entered the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT took the chair at the right of the Speaker, and the Members of the Senate took the seats reserved for them.

The SPEAKER. On the part of the House, the Chair appoints as members of the committee to escort the Right Honorable Winston Churchill, Prime Minister of Great Britain, into the Chamber the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. MCCORMACK; the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. MARTIN; the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. RICHARDS; and the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. EATON.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the part of the Senate, the Chair appoints as members of the committee of escort the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. MCFARLAND], the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], and the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY].

The Doorkeeper announced the Chief Justice of the United States and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court.

The Chief Justice of the United States and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court entered the Hall of the House of Representatives and took the seats reserved for them.

The Doorkeeper announced the Ambassadors, Ministers, and Chargés d'Affaires of foreign governments.

The Ambassadors, Ministers, and Chargés d'Affaires of foreign governments entered the Hall of the House of Representatives and took the seats reserved for them.

The Doorkeeper announced the Cabinet of the President of the United States.

The members of the Cabinet of the President of the United States entered the Hall of the House of Representatives and took the seats reserved for them.

At 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m., the Doorkeeper announced the Prime Minister of Great Britain.

The Prime Minister of Great Britain, escorted by the committee of Senators and Representatives, entered the Hall of the House of Representatives and stood at the Clerk's desk. [Applause, the Members rising.]

The SPEAKER. Members of the Congress, I have the great pleasure, the high privilege, and the distinguished honor of presenting to you the Right Honorable Winston Churchill, Prime Minister of Great Britain. [Applause.]

ADDRESS OF RIGHT HONORABLE WINSTON CHURCHILL, PRIME MINISTER OF GREAT BRITAIN

Mr. CHURCHILL. Mr. President, Mr. Speaker, Members of the Congress, this is the third time it has been my fortune to address the Congress of the United States upon our joint affairs. I am honored indeed by these experiences, which I believe are unique for one who is not an American citizen.

It is also of great value to me on again becoming the head of His Majesty's Government to come over here and take counsel with many trusted friends and comrades of former anxious days.

There is a lot for us to talk about together, so that we can understand each other's difficulties, feelings, and thoughts, and do our best for the common cause. Let us therefore survey the field this afternoon with cool eyes, undimmed by hate or passion, guided by righteous inspiration and not uncheered by hope.

I have not come here to ask you for money [laughter and applause]—to ask you for money to make living more comfortable or easier for us in Britain. Our standards of life are our own business, and we can only keep our self-respect and independence by looking after them ourselves.

During the war we bore our share of the burden and fought from first to last unconquered, and for a while alone, to the utmost limit of our resources. [Applause.]

Your majestic obliteration of all you gave us under lend-lease will never be forgotten by this generation of Britons or by history.

After the war, unwisely as I contended and certainly contrary to American advice, we accepted as normal debts nearly four thousand million pounds sterling of claims by countries we had protected from invasion or had otherwise aided, instead of making counterclaims which would at least have reduced the bill to reasonable proportions.

The thousand million loan we borrowed from you in 1946 and which we are now repaying was spent not on ourselves, but mainly in helping others. In all, since the war, as the late government affirmed, we have lent or given to European or Asiatic countries thirty hundred million pounds in the form of unrequited exports. This, added to the cost of turning over our industry from war to peace and rebuilding homes shattered by bombardment, was more than we could manage without an undue strain upon our life energies from which we shall require both time and self-discipline to recover.

Why do I say all this? Not to compare our financial resources with yours, for we are but a third of your numbers and have much less than a third of your wealth; not to claim praise or reward but to convince you of our native and enduring strength and that our true position is not to be judged by the present state of the dollar exchange or by sterling area finance.

Our production is half as great again as it was before the war; our exports are up by two-thirds; recovery while being retarded has been continuous and we are determined that it shall go on. [Applause.]

As I said at Fulton, in Missouri, 6 years ago, under the auspices of President Truman, let no man underrate the abiding power of the British Commonwealth and Empire. Do not suppose we shall not come through these dark years of privation as we came through the glorious years of agony, or that half a century from now you will not see seventy or eighty millions of Britons spread about the world and united in defense of our traditions and way of life and of the world causes which you and we espouse.

If the population of the English-speaking commonwealths be added to that of the United States we will all have such cooperation with all that such cooperation implies, in the air, on the sea, and all over the globe, and in science, industry and moral force, there will be no quivering precarious balance of power to offer its temptation to ambition or adventure. I am very glad to be able to say the same to you here today. [Applause.]

It is upon this basis of recovery in spite of burdens, that the formidable problem of the new rearmament has fallen upon us.

It is the policy of the United States to help forward in many countries the process of rearmament. In this we who contribute ourselves two-thirds as much as the rest of Europe put together require your aid if we are to realize in good time the very high level of military strength which the Labor government boldly aimed at and to which they committed us. It is for you to judge to what extent the United States interests are involved. Whether you aid us much or little, we shall continue to do our utmost in the common cause. But, Members of the Congress, our contribution will perforce be limited by our own physical resources and thus the combined strength of our two countries and also of the free world will be somewhat less than it might be.

That is why I have come here to ask, not for gold but for steel, not for favors but equipment, and that is why many of our requests have been so well and generously met.

At this point I will venture, if I may, to make a digression. After a lot of experience I have learned that it is not a good thing to dabble in the internal politics of another country. It is hard enough to understand one's own. But I will tell you something about our British politics all the same.

In our island we indulge from time to time in having elections. I believe you sometimes have them over here. [Laughter.] We have had a couple in 20 months, which is quite a lot and quite enough for the time being. [Laughter.] We now look forward to a steady period of administration in accordance with the mandate we have received. Like you we tend to work on the two-party system. The differences between parties on our side of the Atlantic, and perhaps elsewhere between British parties, are often less than they appear to outsiders. In modern Britain the dispute is between a form of socialism which has hitherto respected political liberty on the one hand, and, on the other, free enterprise regulated by law and custom. These two systems of thought, whose differences, I assure you, give plenty of room for argument between political opponents, fortunately overlap quite a lot in practice.

Our complicated society would be deeply injured if we did not practice and develop what is called in the United States the bipartisan habit of mind, which divides, so far as possible, what is done to make a party win and bear in their turn the responsibility of office and what is done to make the nation live and serve high causes.

I hope here, Members of Congress, you will allow me to pay a tribute to the late Senator Vandenberg. [Applause.] I had the honor to meet him on several occasions. His final message in these anxious years gave the feeling that in this period of United States leadership and responsibility all great Americans should work together for all the things that matter most. That, at least, is the spirit which we shall try to maintain among British leaders in our own country and that was the spirit which alone enabled us to survive the perils of the late war.

But now let me return to my theme of the many changes that have taken place since I was last here. There is a jocular saying: To improve is to change, to be perfect is to have changed often. I had to use that once or twice in my long career; but if that were true, everyone ought to be getting on very well. The changes that have happened since I last spoke to Congress are indeed astounding. It is hard to believe we are living in the same world. Former allies have become foes; former foes have become allies; conquered countries have been liberated; liberated nations have been enslaved by communism. Russia, 8 years ago our brave ally, has cast away the admiration and good will her soldiers had gained for her by their valiant defense of their own country. It is not the fault of the western powers if an immense gulf has opened between us. It took a long succession of deliberate and unceasing words and acts of hostility to convince our peoples, as they are now convinced, that they have another tremendous danger to face and that they are now confronted with a new form of tyranny and aggression as dangerous and as hateful as that which we overthrew.

When I visited Washington during the war I used to be told that China would be one of the Big Four Powers among the nations and most friendly to the United States. I was always a bit skeptical, and I think it is now generally admitted that this hopeful dream has not yet come true, but I am by no means sure that China will remain for generations in the Communist group. The Chinese said of themselves several thousand years ago: "China is a sea that salts all the waters that flow into it." There is another Chinese saying about their country which is much more modern. It dates only from the fourth century. This is the saying: "The tail of China is large and will not be wagged." I like that one. [Laughter.]

The British democracy approves the principle of movable party heads and unwaggable national tails. It is due to the working of these important forces that I have the honor to be addressing you at this moment. You have rightly been resolute, Members of the Congress, in confronting Chinese Communist aggression. We take our stand at your side. [Applause.] We are grateful to the United States for bearing nine-tenths or more of the burden in Korea which the United Nations have morally assumed. I am very glad, but whatever diplomatic divergencies there may be from time to time about procedure, you do not allow the Chinese anti-Communists on Formosa to be invaded and massacred from the mainland. [Applause.] We welcome your patience in the armistice negotiations and our two countries are agreed that if the truce we seek is reached only to be broken, our response will be prompt, resolute, and effective. What I have learned over here convinces me that British and United States policy in the Far East will be marked by increasing harmony. I can assure you that our British hearts go out in sympathy to the families of the 100,000 Americans who have given their lives or shed their blood in Korea. We also suffer these pangs for the loss of our own men there, and not only there, but in other parts of Asia as well under the attack by the same enemy.

Whatever course events in Korea may take in the near future, and prophecy will be difficult, much too difficult for me to embark upon it, I am sure our soldiers and your soldiers have not made their sacrifice in vain.

The cause of world law has found strong and invaluable defense, and the foundations of the world instruments for preserving peace, justice, and freedom among the nations have been deepened and strengthened. They stand now not on paper but on rock.

Moreover, the action which President Truman took in your name and with your full support in his stroke against aggression in Korea has produced consequences far beyond Korea, consequences which may well affect the destiny of mankind. The vast process of American rearmament, in which the British Commonwealth and Empire and the growing power of united Europe will play their part to the utmost of their strength, this vast process has already altered the balance of the world and may well, if we all persevere steadfastly and loyally together, avert the danger of a third world war or the horror of defeat and subjugation should one come upon us. [Applause.]

Mr. President and Mr. Speaker, I hope the mourning families throughout the great Republic will find some comfort and some pride in these thoughts.

Another extraordinary change has taken place in the Far East since I last addressed you. Peace has been made with Japan. There, indeed, I congratulate you upon the policy which in wise and skillful hands has brought the Japanese Nation from the woe and shame of defeat in their wicked war back to that association with the western democracies upon which the revival of their traditions, dignity, and happiness can alone be regained and the stability of the Far East assured. [Applause.]

In the anxious and confused expanses of Southeast Asia, there is another sphere where our aims and interests and those of the French, who are fighting bravely at heavy cost to their strength in Europe, may find a fertile field for agreement on policy. I feel sure that the conversations we have had between our two foreign Secretaries, Mr. Eden and Mr. Acheson, men whose names and experience are outstanding throughout the world, will help to place the problems of Southeast Asia in their right setting.

It would not be helpful to the common cause—for our evils all spring from one center—if an effective truce in Korea led only to a transference of Communist aggression to these other fields. Our problems will not be solved unless they are steadily viewed and acted upon as a whole in their integrity as a whole. [Applause.]

In the Middle East enormous changes have also taken place since I was last in power in my own country. When the war ended, the western nations were respected and predominant throughout these ancient lands, and there were quite a lot of people who had a good word to say about Great Britain. Today it is a somber and confusing scene. Yet there is still sunshine as well as shadow. From the days of the Balfour declaration I have desired that the Jews should have a national home, and I have worked for that end. I rejoice to pay my tribute here to the achievements of those who have founded the Israelite State, who have defended themselves with tenacity, and who offer asylum to great numbers of Jewish refugees. [Applause.]

I hope that with their aid they may convert deserts into gardens. But if they are to enjoy peace and prosperity, they must strive to renew and preserve their friendly relations with the Arab world, without which widespread misery might swallow all.

Britain's power to influence the fortunes of the Middle East and guard it from aggression is far less today, now that we have laid aside our imperial responsibility for India and its armies. It is no longer for us alone to bear the whole burden of maintaining the freedom of the famous waterway of the Suez Canal. That has become an international rather than a national responsibility. I welcome the statesmanlike conception of a four-power approach toward Egypt announced by the late British Government, in which Britain, United States, France, and Turkey may share with Egypt in the protection of the world interest involved, among which Egypt's own interests are paramount. [Applause.]

Such a policy is urgent. Britain is maintaining over 50,000 troops in the Suez Canal zone who again might be well employed elsewhere—not for national vainglory or self-seeking advantage, but in the common interest of all nations. We do not seek to be masters of Egypt. We are there only as the servants and guardians of the commerce of the world. It would enormously aid us in our task if even token forces of the other partners in the four power proposal were stationed in the canal zone as a symbol of the unity of purpose which inspires us. I believe it is no exaggeration to state that such token forces would probably bring into harmony all that movement by which the four power policy may be made to play a decisive part by peaceful measures and bring to an end the wide disorders of the Middle East, in which, let me assure you, there lurk dangers not less great than those which the United States have stemmed in Korea.

Now I come to Europe where the greatest of all our problems and dangers lie. I have long worked for the cause of a united Europe, and even of a United States of Europe, which would enable that continent, the source of so much of our culture, ancient and modern, and the parent of the New World, to resume and revive its former splendors. It is my sure hope and conviction that European unity will be achieved and that it will not ultimately be limited only to the countries at present composing Western Europe. I said at Zurich in 1946 that France should take Germany by the hand and lead her back into the family of nations, and thus end the thousand-year quarrel which has torn Europe to pieces, and finally plunged the whole world twice over into slaughter, and havoc. Real and rapid progress is being made toward European unity, and it is both the duty and the policy of both Great Britain and our Commonwealth, and of the United States, to do our utmost—all of us—to help and speed it. As a forerunner of a united Europe there is the European army which could never achieve its necessary strength without the inclusion of Germany. If this necessary and urgent object is being achieved by the fusion of the forces of the continental nations outside what I have called, in former times, the iron curtain, that great operation deserves our fullest support. But, Members of Congress, fusion is not the only way in which the defense of Western Europe can be built. The system of a grand alliance, such as has been created by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, is no bar to the fusion of as many of its members as wish for this closer unity; and the United States, British, and Canadian troops will stand, indeed are already standing, shoulder to shoulder, with their European comrades in defense of the civilization and freedom of the west. We stand together under General Eisenhower to defend the common cause from violent aggression. What matters most is not the form of fusion or melding—a word I learned over here—but the numbers of divisions and of armored divisions, and the power of the air forces and their weapons available for unified action under the supreme commander.

We in Britain have denuded our island of military formations to an extent I have never seen before; and I cannot accept the slightest reproach from any quarter that we are not doing our full duty, because the British commonwealth of nations, spread all over the world, is not prepared to become a state or group of states in any continental Federal system on either side of the Atlantic.

The sooner strong enough forces can be assembled in Europe under united command, the more effective will be the deterrents against a third world war. The sooner also will our sense of security and the fact of our security be seen to reside in valiant, resolute, and well-armed manhood, rather than in the awful secrets which science has wrested from nature. These are at present, it must be recognized, the secrets, the supreme deterrent against a third world war and the most effective guarantee of victory in it.

If I may say this, Members of the Congress, be careful above all things, therefore, not to let go of the atomic weapon until you are sure, and more than sure, that other means of preserving peace are in your hands. [Applause.]

It is my belief that by accumulating deterrents of all kinds against aggression we shall in fact ward off the fearful catastrophe, the fears of which darken the life and mar the progress of all the peoples of the globe. We must persevere steadfastly and faithfully in the task unto which, under the United States' leadership, we have solemnly bound ourselves. Any weakening of our purpose, any disruption of our organization will bring about the very evils which we all dread, from which we all suffer and from which many of us would perish.

We must not lose patience and we must not lose hope. It may be that presently a new mood will reign behind the iron curtain; if so, it will be easy for them to show it, but the democracies must be on their guard against being deceived by a false dawn.

We seek or covet no one's territory; we plan no forestalling war; we trust and pray that all will come right. Even during these years of what is called the cold war material production in every land is continually improving through the use of new machinery and better organization, and the advance of peaceful science. But the great bound forward in progress and prosperity for which mankind is longing cannot come until the shadow of war has passed away. There are, however, historic compensations for the stresses which we suffer in the cold war. Under the pressure and menace of Communist aggression the fraternal association of the United States with Britain and the British Commonwealths and the new unity growing up in Europe, nowhere more hopeful than between France and Germany, all these harmonies are being brought forward perhaps by several generations in the destiny of the world. If this proves true, and it has certainly proved true up to date, the architects in the Kremlin may be found to have built a different and a far better world structure than what they planned. [Applause.]

Members of the Congress, I have dwelt today repeatedly upon many of the changes that have happened throughout the world since you last invited me to address you here, and I am sure you will agree that it is hardly possible to recognize the scene or believe it can truly have come to pass. But there is one thing that is exactly the same as when I was here last: Britain and the United States are working together and working for the same high cause. [Applause.]

Bismarck once said that the supreme fact of the nineteenth century was that Britain and the United States spoke the same language. Let us make sure that the supreme fact of the twentieth century is that they tread the same path. [Applause, the Members rising.]

At 1 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m., the Right Honorable Winston Churchill, Prime Minister of Great Britain, accompanied by the committee of escort, retired from the Chamber.

The Doorkeeper escorted the invited guests from the Chamber in the following order:

The members of the President's Cabinet.

The Chief Justice and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Ambassadors, Ministers, and chargés d'affaires of foreign governments.

JOINT MEETING DISSOLVED

The SPEAKER. The Chair declares the joint meeting of the two Houses now dissolved.

Thereupon (at 1 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the joint meeting of the two Houses was dissolved.

The Members of the Senate retired to their Chamber.

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker at 2 o'clock p. m.

PROCEEDINGS DURING THE RECESS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings had during the recess may be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

THE LATE JAMES D. HAGGERTY

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and include as a part of my remarks editorials and notices of the death and funeral of Mr. James D. Haggerty.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, last Monday I made a special trip back to Woburn, Mass., to attend the funeral of a loyal friend, Mr. James D. Haggerty. This was a very sad occasion for me, for his family, and for many others who knew him and whose lives were enriched by his friendship, understanding, and sterling character.

For 52 years Mr. Haggerty was associated with the newspaper and publishing profession. He was the founder and editor of the Woburn Daily Times. He lived to see his splendid newspaper mark its fiftieth anniversary. Mr. Haggerty was a gentleman of high principles, courage, and resolute determination. He was a man of profound faith and a man of honor and integrity.

Mr. Haggerty was not just a journalist publishing another newspaper. Journalism and publishing did not make Mr. Haggerty, but rather he brought such fine qualities and principles to journalism that he caused it to be a highly respected profession in his community. During his long publishing career he held resolutely the ideal that a newspaper was not a medium for the printing and distribution of scandal. In his view no scandal benefited family or community. He believed the prime duty of an editor was to elevate, build up, and work for the benefit of the whole community, not to be destructive and tear down people or community life and spirit. He would give up the sale of his newspapers in order not to be a scandal monger. Would that there were more of his kind today. Many editors and publishers of our great newspapers in the country today could learn and profit much from the high ideals and fine principles of the late Editor James Haggerty.

Mr. Haggerty was a genuine American and a great American. He was a deeply religious man. He was the father of 13 splendid children. He was admired and respected not only by the entire community but by all of those having the good fortune to know him throughout the Commonwealth and the Nation. Mr. Haggerty and his family long have been among my loyal and dearest friends.

The following is the story of his life as it appeared in his own newspaper, the Woburn Daily Times, of Woburn, Mass.:

James D. Haggerty, editor, publisher, and founder of the Woburn Daily Times, who fought his way from printer's devil in the old and forgotten print shop of Mark Allen to the proud record of rounding out a half century as a publisher and journalist, died early today at his home, 639 Main Street, Woburn. Mr. Haggerty, with his characteristic tenacity, with his "never say die" policy in any and all problems, fought valiantly against a fatal disease persistently, actually dying with his shoes on, as he would have liked it.

James D. Haggerty, first encountered the illness that eventually caused his death on June 25, 1948, when he underwent a serious surgical operation at the Choate Memorial Hospital. At the time, medical authorities believed that he would not come off the table alive. Instead he not only survived the operation, but from his hospital bed and later from a wheel chair, he directed a great segment of the Choate Hospital drive, his real hobby, in raising the capital building outlay for $300,000 which building has now become an actuality. Mr. Haggerty desired to live to see the passage of two things, the fiftieth anniversary of his Woburn Daily Times, which occurred on October 21, 1951. The other was the completion of the hospital wing. The latter will be officially dedicated tomorrow. Mr. James D. Haggerty, who had been president of the association was named the honorary chairman of the dedicatory exercises.

James D. Haggerty was born in the Rag Rock section, famed before the turn of the century for the sturdy stock, the fine type of American that was born there. Mr. Haggerty was a typical example of that stock. He first saw the light of day on April 8, 1870, the son of the late John and Mary A. McGee Haggerty. He was born in the old Haggerty household, 80 Harrison Avenue, now occupied by his sister and brother, Mary and Lewis Haggerty.

Mr. Haggerty had the benefit of a common school education and as was the economic order of the day, he was obliged to seek employment early in his youth. What education he had ahead of him he was obliged to forego to assist in enriching the family larder. The tannery was the only employment absorption of those days, when Woburn was a single-industry community. He found employment in a famous south end tannery as an apprentice laborer.

ORIGINALLY WORKED IN SOUTH END TANNERY

Despite the fact that his work was conscientious he lost his job through no fault of his own. Those were the days when the mention of collective bargaining between employer and employee was akin to treason. The oppressive work conditions gave rise to the first union movement known to the community of Woburn. It was the Knights of Labor, formed by the late William E. Dever, who lived to become the mayor of Chicago. Mr. Dever, the late Dennis L. Sullivan, who became a lawyer and city solicitor late in life, and the late John Haggerty were the leaders in the new labor movement. The attempt resulted in a lockout eventually but while in the formative stage the names of these three men became the start of a blacklist in the tannery employment offices.

Young Haggerty reported to his place of employment for his 10-hour day, with dinner pail under arm one morning in March with the thermometer down to 10 below zero. He had trudged from the "Bork" to Conn Street, where he was met by the foreman and informed that his services were no longer needed. He was the object of reprisals against the activities of his brother John.

With tears in his eyes which froze on his cheeks as they cascaded downward, he walked the railroad tracks from Conn Street to the Main Street crossing. It was considered a disgrace to youth of those days to return home and announce that he had lost his job, and fearful of that ultimatum, little James Haggerty moved slowly up the Main Street.

Allen Block is now the present Tanners National Bank Building. It was owned by Mark Allen, who had a printshop on the top floor. When little James arrived at this point, there was a sign out, "Boy wanted." The youthful Haggerty picked the sign off its hanger, wrapped it under his arm, and ascended three flights. He put the sign down and announced, "You now have a boy." That was the start of his employment, but he did not see Mark Allen until 2 days later. He hired out with the shop foreman. To hold an apprentice job in any of the trades it was imperative that a contract be drawn and executed. So James "hired out" to Mark Allen for 3 years at the munificent salary of $3 per week.

The early dip in printer's ink imprinted the plan of his life work on J. D. Haggerty. He became an avid student of the type case. He excelled in putting out printing jobs par excellence, and he was still under the yoke of apprenticeship. At the end of 3 years he was a full-fledged journeyman and then after a little time with Mark Allen he was offered a position as salesman and consultant for the American Type Founders Co., makers of printing machinery. He accepted and he traveled considerably, chiefly in Massachusetts, and he directed the installation of machinery in many plants. It was in this position, he was asked to install a plant in the working boys' home in Newton, which is a going institution the present day. He set up the plant and the Xaverian Brothers, who sponsor the "boys" training there, asked Mr. Haggerty to stay until the plant was in
