My telegram No.[illegible] Saving from San Francisco: Conversation with Japanese Prime Minister.

On the way to Washington from San Francisco on September 9th I stressed to Mr.Acheson and Mr.Dulles my hope that Japan would be in no hurry to take a decision on recognition of either Chinese Government. It was my understanding that Mr.Dulles had agreed that this was a decision for Japan to take for herself when she was free to do so. I pointed out that she would not be free to do so until after the Treaty came into force. I hoped that any pressure from Congress in favour of a Treaty between Japan and Nationalist China before ratification by the United States would be resisted.

2. They were sympathetic and agreed that it would be a mistake for the Japanese to make any approach to the Chinese Nationalist authorities before the United Kingdom had ratified the Treaty though they admitted that it would help to secure United States ratification if some action in this direction had been taken. Mr.Dulles said that he thought that the Japanese would need some sort of working arrangement with the authorities in Formosa though he did not think there need be any question of formal recognition of the Nationalist Government. I reminded Mr.Dulles that when in London he had agreed with our view that for economic reasons Japan should enter into some sort of practical relationship with Peking. Mr.Dulles did not deny this. Mr.Acheson and Mr.Dulles said that they had been shown the draft of Mr.Yoshida's speech at the San Francisco Conference and on their advice he had cut out from it a statement to the general effect that Japan would never be prepared to recognise the Chinese People's Government. They had told him that they thought he was unwise to commit himself so definitely in this sense.
