Addressed to Foreign Office telegram No. 1767 of December 13th
Repeated for information to Washington.

Your telegram No. 1428: Dulles talks.

F J10310/34

I informed Dulles by letter of your instructions.

2. Dulles asked me to call this afternoon, and showed me a memorandum. This stated that in view of United States commitments towards Japan, it was necessary to be sure that Japan would carry out policies consistent with the policies of the United States. In these circumstances it was considered desirable for Japan to define her attitude to the nationalist government of Chiang Kai-Shek. Accordingly it was suggested that Japan should conclude a "bilateral treaty of peace with the national government, which would restore peace and re-establish relations along the lines of the unilateral treaty". The memorandum went on to say, however, that it was not contemplated that the authority of the nationalist government should be recognised as extending beyond the actual territory controlled by that government; that this should be made clear in the text of the treaty, and that accordingly Japan would in no way be expected to prejudice her future relations with the authorities in control of the mainland of China.

3. I was not given a copy of the memorandum because Dulles said he did [?grp.emitted] want to be too formal but

Tokyo telegram No. 1767 to Foreign Office

I think I have given a fair summary of its essential features. Dulles said he had shown it earlier to the Prime Minister who "seemed sympathetic" to the suggestion about the treaty. I wonder.

4. Dulles then launched into one of his usual long explanations as to why this step was necessary. Boiled down what it amounted to was that at and after San Francisco all was well on the China question. Then Yoshida said certain things in the Diet and was alleged to have [grp.undec.] said other things as a result of which the China issue had again become alive one in Congress. Not only was ratification in danger, but certain elements, who had always been opposed to the treaty including the Pentagon, were now becoming vocal again. In short a treaty with Chiang Kai-Shek on lines indicated, was the least that might be expected to appease the opposition, who would actually want much more. Dulles did not know that Chiang Kai-Shek could accept such a treaty. Probably he would not, but the United States administration would not be prepared to support him in a demand that he [grp.undec.] recognised as having authority over the whole of China.

5. Finally Dulles expressed the hope that the United Kingdom might be disposed to agree with the step proposed in the memorandum.

See my immediately following telegram.

Foreign Office please pass to Washington as my telegram No. 106.
