Addressed to Foreign Office telegram No. 1768 of 13th December
Repeated for information to Washington

My immediately preceding telegram. (F 5103/0)

I said that the proposal made in the memorandum was very far from anything you had in mind, and on my existing instructions you were firmly opposed to anything in the nature of a treaty between Japan and Chiang Kai-shek even in respect to Formosa. I then reiterated many of the arguments which I used in my earlier interview, why Japan should not be coerced into concluding a treaty with Chiang Kai-shek. I said we considered there was no future in Chiang Kai-shek, whereupon Dulles said he personally agreed, nevertheless there was a considerable body of opinion on American [gp. omtd.] which thought otherwise. He himself however was convinced of the necessity of denying Formosa to the Communists. This I said was a different question. Dulles said he wanted to make it clear that he did not want [gp.undec.] "fudge" on the agreement reached between him and Mr. Morrison last June, but he considered that this present proposal did not do this because it did not prejudice Japan's future relations with the mainland of China.

2. Taking up this point, I said I personally very much doubted whether this would in fact be the case. If Japan were to make a treaty similar to these of the multilateral treaty, she must presumably make it with a state with whom for example the state of war would be terminated. What was that state, and how would it be described? When Mr. Dulles said he presumed it would [? gp. omitd.] called the National Government of the Republic of China, I replied that that was precisely my point. It was bound to prejudice Japan's relations with the mainland of China to acknowledge Chiang Kai-shek Government in this way.

3. Dulles then said he was never clear what your real objection was to a treaty between Japan and Chiang Kai-shek on the basis of the latter's authority over the territory he actually controlled. Now I had raised a new point which, as far as he was aware, had never been considered, and he was quite prepared to consider anything we might have to put forward. He went on to talk about divided sovereignty, and suggested that a definition might be found of Chiang's Government which need not prejudice Japan's future relations with China proper.

4. I said that the point raised was my own, and that I did [? gp. omtd.] know what your views might be on this particular issue. I could only report to you what had passed, and ask for your instructions. Dulles said he would telegraph to the State Department.

5. My own views are contained in my immediately following telegram.

Foreign Office please pass to Washington as my telegram No. 107.
