FJ 10310/50

Dear Ro.

The Yoshida letter will presumably have been thrashed out before this reaches you, but I have now had an opportunity of studying the Memorandum which Dulles handed to Oliver Franks on 9th January and which came to us by the bag, and for the record I would like to set a few matters straight. It is, as the Secretary of State has observed in the margin, an incredible document.

In the first place we know nothing of the approach made by Sebald to Yoshida on the 19th May. I cannot, of course, recall the details of all our conversations in London in June, but I do not remember any reference to this at that time, though Dulles should have told us about it in view of the doubts which existed in the minds of the Cabinet on this very question.

Secondly, in paragraphs 7 and 8 of the Memorandum an effort is made to suggest that Japan is really sovereign already and therefore free to do as she likes. I need not comment on this, except to point out that any agreements the Japanese Government may reach are subject to the agreement of S.C.A.P., which is hardly full sovereignty.

FJ 1052/52

You will recall that George Clutton during the summer had an uncomfortable feeling that as far as Tokyo was concerned there was some move for the conclusion of an agreement with Formosa before the ratification of the Peace Treaty (see his letter to Charles Johnston No. 1019/552/51 of 10th July). Tomlinson thereafter spoke to Dulles, and the American record of this, which is given in paragraph 4 of the Memorandum, differs very materially from Tomlinson's own account contained in his letter 1076/977/51 of 8th August. Again the account given in paragraph 6 of the Memorandum, about the conversation between Mr. Morrison, Dulles and Acheson on the way back from San Francisco differs very considerably from the British record contained in Washington telegram No. 945 Saving of 13th September.

There is one more point. The Secretary of State referred to "advice" which I gave to the Japanese. Strictly speaking this was not advice, and I merely acquainted Mr. Yoshida with our view of the matter. I told/told Sebald about it, and told Dulles the whole story when he was here in December. The Memorandum, nevertheless, suggests that we were exercising pressure upon the Japanese behind American backs.

Perhaps the worst feature of the whole business, from the point of view of Dulles himself as a statesman or diplomatist, is that on three occasions (once to the Australian Cabinet in Canberra, once during the London talks and lastly to me here), he admitted that Chiang Kai-shek has no future. Yet Dulles does not scruple to force Japan into a treaty with him.

I personally do not intend to write any more about this subject, which will continue to leave a bad taste in most people's mouths for a long time to come.

I am sending a copy of this letter to Washington.

Yours ever.

Bill Hayter.
