Mr Dulles
3117

(COPY)

COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM John Foster Dulles

"CAPITOL CLOAK ROOM"
Tuesday, May 15, 1951, 10:30-11:00 PM

BANCROFT:
Ambassador Dulles, will General MacArthur's dismissal have any effect on the Japanese Peace Treaty?

SEVAREID:
Can the United States and Britain ever agree on the future of Formosa?

COLLINGWOOD:
Is the bipartisan foreign policy a thing of the past?

- - - - - -

ANNOUNCER:
"Capitol Cloak Room" -- from the nation's capital, CBS again brings you another informal interview with an outstanding public figure. Tonight's guest is John Foster Dulles, special ambassador of the President. Mr. Dulles will meet with CBS correspondents Griffing Bancroft, Eric Sevareid and Charles Collingwood. Moderator of the discussion is Lew Shollengerger, CBS Washington Director of Special Events.

Mr. Shollenberger!

SHOLLENBERGER:
Mr. Dulles, welcome to "Capitol Cloak Room" this evening. Your job now as Special Ambasaador of the President is to write the Japanese peace treaty. You have a unique background for that job. As your friends would put it, early in your life, you started out on a career in international relations at the Hague Peace Conference in 1907. After that, after serving in World War I, you helped write the peace of 1918-1919. You had many other foreign assignments, including one to Moscow as late as 1947. Then, you became a United States Senator and served as a member of the American Delegation to the United Nations. Now, you're writing the Japanese peace treaty and since that question is now assuming greater and greater importance we'd like to start with that first question you heard just a moment ago from Mr. Bancroft.

BANCROFT:
Well, Ambassador Dulles, you were in Japan after General MacArthur was dismissed. I know you had a two-way conversation with him on the plane as you passed, crossing the Pacific, so you're in a pretty good position, I think, to answer that question -- will General MacArthur's dismissal have any effect on the Japanese peace treaty?

DULLES:
Yes, Mr. Bancroft, it will have an effect and I'm afraid an adverse effect. General MacArthur stood as a symbol in Japan of a quick peace and a just peace and that symbol was struck down overnight and the Japanese people are worried as to what it means.

BANCROFT:
Well, will it -- do you mean that they will not get a just peace and a quick peace?

DULLES:
Well, I think they will but they're not sure about it.

BANCROFT:
I see!

DULLES:
And they are worried. The reason I went over so quickly after General MacArthur was relieved was to try to reassure them.

BANCROFT:
I see!

DULLES:
It's one thing to reassure them with words. It's another thing to do it by deeds and now we're on the spot, so to speak, and we've got to come through with it quickly or else they will feel that the removal of General MacArthur really meant a change of policy and dilatory tactics as far as a peace treaty is concerned.

BANCROFT:
Well, Mr. Ambassador, it seems to me what you're saying is it did have an effect on the Japanese people, but will it have an effect on the treaty itself?

DULLES:
No, I don't think it will have any effect upon the treaty because our intention is to push right along to conclude the peace treaty and in that respect, I think, both General MacArthur and President Truman are in agreement.

COLLINGWOOD:
Mr. Ambassador, you're devoting all of your talents to this peace treaty. It's obviously something of great importance to the Department of State, to the policy of this country, - why is the Japanese peace treaty so important? We've been going along with Japan for five years and they seem to be happy enough, everything is going all right, why are we so anxious to get a peace treaty concluded?

DULLES:
Well, you say that ... you're happy enough, but the Japanese people are really not very happy under the present situation where they're being run by a foreign country and I don't think you would be happy if you were being run by a foreign country. The United States is a good country to run anybody's affairs, but everybody likes to run their own affairs and the Japanese people are really extremely anxious to get back their own freedom and independence.

COLLINGWOOD:
How about our interest in it?

DULLES:
Well, our interest in it is to have the Japanese people a free, freedom-loving people, who will voluntarily throw in their lot with the free world. They're in a very dangerous position there and if they throw in their lot with the Communist world then it really means trouble. It was hard enough to have to deal with the Japanese when they were alone against us and, if you have a combination of Japan, Soviet Russia, and Communist China, all working together then that is really a pretty formidable combination to have to combat.

COLLINGWOOD:
Do you think there's a chance that Japan might go Communist?

DULLES:
Yes, there is a chance, of course.

COLLINGWOOD:
Under what circumstances, Mr. Ambassador?

DULLES:
If you have bad economic conditions in Japan, if you don't give the Japanese back their freedom, if they feel repressed, restless, sullen, resentful, then they'll take the escape it offers and the Soviet Union offers them a very attractive way out. It offers them raw materials, it offers them markets, it offers them an opportunity to expand in the Pacific and achieve what were their goals in the last war.

COLLINGWOOD:
Is that why you say it was important that we do conclude expeditiously a treaty with Japan?

DULLES:
Yes, because if the Japanese don't get their freedom back pretty soon and, as I say, they've been nearly six years now under occupation, if they don't get their freedom back pretty soon they are going to get restless and they're going to accept the keys to the jail from anybody who offers it and if the Soviet Union offers them freedom they'll take it from that quarter.

SEVAREID:
Well, Mr. Dulles, isn't this going to be a Japanese freedom after this treaty really only in principle? Aren't we going to have for a long time to come, aren't they going to have to rely on American economic help of a very substantial kind and American military protection there?

DULLES:
I don't think they will have to rely very largely upon American economic help as long as we use them to do the things that they're capable of doing. They have great skills and they can do many things which need to be done and, if they get reasonably paid for that, they'll get along all right economically.

SHOLLENBERGER:
Well, from a military standpoint ... can I just complete Mr. Sevareid's question, get the answer to it ... you said from a military standpoint won't they have to depend upon American aid?

DULLES:
They will, just in the same way that the United Kingdom is and France is and Germany is. Today, security is collective and Japan will not find it alone any more than any other country will find it alone, but that does not deprive them of their freedom.

SHOLLENBERGER:
Does that employ Japan, in some kind of a military defensive alliance with us, as the British and others are?

DULLES:
Yes! We propose as part of the Japanese Peace Treaty to make a collective security pact with Japan and that's part of the arrangement that we contemplate.

BANCROFT:
Well, Mr. Ambassador, you mentioned the possibility that Japan could go Communist if the economic conditions got bad. What is the chance of that? What are the economic conditions in Japan now?

DULLES:
The economic conditions in Japan are reasonably good. I would say that they approximate the prewar level. They're somewhat below that, but they've been improving a good deal and they've improved very greatly since the first postwar years. Now, they'll have to get raw materials and they will have to get work to do, but they are good workers. They've got good workshops and today they're being used very largely by the Army to assist in building trucks and nonmilitary equipment for use in Korea. I believe that in the last nine months the ... our defense establishment has put about three hundred million dollars into Japan to pay the Japanese for work that they were doing along that line.

COLLINGWOOD:
But that's not long-term economic help, is it, Ambassador Dulles? Can Japan exist as a viable, stable, economic enterprise without close association with her neighbor, China, on the mainland?

DULLES:
Perhaps not for a long time, but there is plenty of opportunity for the Japanese to do work in connection with the needs of the countries of southeast Asia which are not Communist, and also they can get raw materials there. For example, prior to 1930 or thereabouts the Japanese got most of their iron ore from Malaya and from the Philippines. They only switched the pattern of their trade to depend primarily upon Manchuria at a time when they were afraid that the League of Nations would impose sanctions against them. They wanted to have their own sources of raw material, but prior to that time their pattern of trade very largely lay with the countries of southeast Asia, with the Philippines, and with the United States, with the overseas countries.

BANCROFT:
Well, Mr. Ambassador, the United States, as I understand it, is advocating a pretty tight economic blockade of Red China, which would include Manchuria, - how can Japan exist without trading with China?

DULLES:
Well, they've been existing without much trade with China right along because the type of blockade which is now being advocated and which was voted today by the collec ... the Collective Measures Committee of the United Nations, that type of blockade has in effect been in force by Japan under the administration of SCAP, the Supreme Commander, which is General MacArthur. They have been preventing very largely the export of essential goods, strategic goods, to China for several years now..... (interruption)

COLLINGWOOD:
But SCAP did allow ... but SCAP did allow a good deal of goods to go from Japan to China, did they not?

DULLES:
A certain amount of goods went to China, but since the Korean affair of last June no goods of a strategic character, no goods of the type which are now recommended to be embargoed, have gone from Japan to China. At least, that's my information.

SEVAREID: Ambassador Dulles, you're about to go, as I understand it, over to London to talk with the British about this Treaty. I assume it's going to be written and negotiated without Russian participation, despite the Russian protest, - how about the Communist China part in this? Don't the British still take the position that China ought to help write this Treaty?

DULLES:
The British have taken the position that the Communist regime of China should be brought into the negotiations. The United States has rejected that viewpoint. I rather think that we will reach an agreement with the British on that point, but it's not at all certain. Actually, we've taken into account very much the Chinese viewpoint and I was struck by the fact that the Soviet Russian note, which came in two or three days ago, criticizing the Treaty, virtually made no criticism of it at all on the ground that it is not adequately taking care of the Chinese interests. We have been very scrupulous to look out for Chinese interests by this draft Treaty.

SEVAREID:
Well, how can the United States look after the interest of Communist China in this manner?

DULLES:
Well, we can look after the interests of Communist China a lot better than Mao Tse-tung can because he's looking out for the interests of Russia and we really are concerned with the interests of China. We've been friends of China for a hundred and fifty years and Mao Tse-tung is nothing but a puppet regime who's serving the interest of the Soviet Union, not the interests of China.

BANCROFT:
Well, Mr. Ambassador, if we oppose, and, of course, we do, Red China, sitting in on this peace conference, are we going to insist that Nationalist China sit in on this deliberation, or, is China ... neither Chinese Government to be represented?

DULLES:
We are getting advice and counsel from every quarter which we think responsibly represents the Chinese viewpoint and that includes getting advice and counsel from the representatives of the Nationalist Government of China, because we believe that representatives of that Government have at heart the real interests of China more than the Communist regime does.

SEVAREID:
Well, what can the British do about their position? When you're talking with them in London, Mr. Dulles, - obviously, this Government in the present circumstance here can't possibly let the Chinese Communists sit in on this Treaty and is it a question, then, of the British just backtracking on this matter or else what can they do?

DULLES:
Well, I .....

SEVAREID:
(both speaking) ..... compromise it?

DULLES:
What?

SEVAREID:
How do you compromise that one?

DULLES:
Well, that remains to be seen. That's what I'm going over to talk to Mr. Morrison about.

COLLINGWOOD:
Well, suppose you do talk to Mr. Morrison and you decide that you aren't going to have Communist China sit in on any negotiations on this Treaty and you get a treaty which you think properly takes care of Chinese interests and it goes around the various countries to be signed, who's going to sign it for China? Are the Nationalists going to sign it or the Communists or will any Chinese sign the Treaty with their closest neighbor?

DULLES:
Well, we haven't discussed that question as yet. The first task we're approaching is the task of getting drafted a Treaty, which we think will be generally acceptable. Then, we will decide on a signing conference and we haven't really come up to the point yet as to just who would be asked to sign and who wouldn't. There will be some countries that will be consulted, who probably may not be actual signatories to the Treaty in the first instance. Perhaps the Japanese themselves will decide who they will want to sign the peace treaty with. That's a question we haven't finally come to an answer about.

SHOLLENBERGER:
We've been talking here all along about the effect on Japan and about the effect on ourselves. How about our Allies in the South Pacific? There are some questions over here on that about Australia and New Zealand. Mr. Bancroft?

BANCROFT:
Generally, how do they feel about it? We hear, for example, that they are sort of worried about the rearmament, remilitarization, of Japan. What ... what have you learned from them about that?

DULLES:
Well, let me say first, Mr. Bancroft, there is not going to be any remilitarization of Japan. We do think that the Japanese ought in due course to be prepared to carry a fair burden of the task of their own defense, that it shouldn't fall entirely upon the United States to defend them, but that doesn't mean a remilitarized Japan at all. As far as .....

BANCROFT:
Well, on the .....

DULLES:
Excuse me!

BANCROFT:
Yes, go ahead! Sorry!

DULLES:
It is quite true, I found when I was in Australia and New Zealand that they they're quite concerned about the possibility of a strong Japan. It's not just a question of what you'd call remilitarization, but it's an economically strong Japan, a Japan that will have shipping facilities, and in general which will be a strong country. The United States believes that the only future that holds out hope in the Western Pacific is to develop a Japan, which will be strong and vigorous and peace-loving, and we think that is a case today. We think General MacArthur's administration and occupation have made the Japanese a peace-loving people. But other people are suspicious. And the Australians, New Zealanders say well you may be wrong and if you're wrong, what's going to happen, are you going to stand by us, and we say yes we will stand by you.

COLLINGWOOD:
And That's the ... is that the genesis of the other thing that you're now working on I believe which is an arrangement between this country and Australia and New Zealand, a sort of Pacific pact, is that the way ..(inter.)

DULLES:
Yes. But we don't call it the Pacific pact because it isn't quite as big as that. But we are working on a triangular arrangement with the Australia, New Zealand and the United States which would in essence provide that if there should be an attack on any one of us in the Pacific the rest of us would regard that as a danger to our own peace and security and would act accordingly.

And Australia and New Zealand feel that they will be reassured by that and that if we should guess wrong in our planning about Japan and Japan should become militaristic again, which we don't believe, but if it should and they should again threaten to attack Australia, New Zealand we would again be at their side.

SEVAREID:
Mr. Dulles, how are you going to handle your talk with the British now as a first next step this question of Formosa island which the Japanese held for so land.

DULLES:
Mr. Sevareid, we believe - from the American standpoint at least - that the Japanese peace treaty should only liquidate the interest of Japan in the island of Formosa and should not involve itself with the future Formosa.

Now the future Formosa is a question which is very difficult to settle at the present time in view of the distrubed conditions that exist in the Far East. And we don't think that a Japanese peace treaty ought to be held up until all allies agree about the future of Formosa. That's no concern of Japan's. If Japan gives up her sovereignty over Formosa that's all you can expect Japan to do and you ought not to hold up the peace treaty for Japan because Allies can't agree.

SEVAREID:
The Japanese are completely reconciled though .. (inter.)

DULLES:
The Japanese are quite prepared to renounce all right and title and interest in Formosa.

SHOLLEN:
As we've been talking about our foreign allies, about the effect on Japan, you leave unanswered a question here at home about bipartisan foreign policy. I believe Mr. Collingwood had a question on that.

COLLINGWOOD:
Yes, I asked that because bipartisan foreign policy has been more notable by its absence than by its presence and it has been on these matters in the Far East that the bipartisan foreign policy has broken. How do you think that you will be able to get your treaty through the Senate with support from both sides of that body?

DULLES:
There's every indication, Mr. Collingwood, that that will be the case. We've worked in the very closest cooperation with the Senate and the House for that matter, but it primarily concerns the Senate because (indistinct) a treaty.

COLLINGWOOD:
Yes.

DULLES:
And I've worked there with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and their Far Eastern Sub-committee and they've been kept in complete touch with everything that I'm doing. And so far there's every reason to think that there will be bipartisan support. And certainly there's support of what I've been doing so far.

And in this great controversy that is going on now the two principal figures, Pres. Truman you might say and General MacArthur, are both back of the Japanese peace treaty. They've both given every assurance that they're going to back me up. Now that's a good example for the country to follow. However much they differ. And they certainly do differ. They agree when the vital interests of the United States is concerned and it is concerned in this Japanese peace treaty.

COLLINGWOOD:
This is just about the last area of bipartisanship that we have left then, isn't it?

DULLES:
It's about the last area that's left. But if we make good on this it may be catchy again it might spread.

COLLINGWOOD:

Do you think as a principal architect of the bipartisan foreign policy that used to hold that there is a chance and a hope of re-establishing that cooperation of the two parties in foreign policy?

DULLES:

I think there is. I think this demonstrates it. I think it shows that if you really keep in touch and close contact with both Republicans and the Democrats in Congress and have a mission which is in the interest of the United States that they will act as loyal Americans and get behind you. Certainly they've been behind me so far.

SEVAREID:

Well, Mr. Dulles, it's been a frequent and familiar Republican Party complaint on the Hill that in the past years since the war ended they have not been consulted, as they put it, on Far Eastern foreign policy. What is your view about that? A good many State Department people say that that just isn't so.

DULLES:

Well, I have had recently only responsibility for the Japanese affair. And certainly as far as that is concerned there's been very full and very complete consultations with the senators both Republicans and Democrats.

Now as to other areas, I wouldn't say. I think there has been a failure to have cooperation in general on Far Eastern policy over the past 4, 5-years. We had cooperation in relation to Europe. We had cooperation in relation to the United Nations in the first instance and then in regard to the North Atlantic treaty and the military assistance program. But there has been very little bipartisan cooperation or consultation on Far Eastern policy, I think except in this particular area of the Japanese peace treaty where I've been trying very hard to preserve it.

BANCROFT:

Well, Ambassador Dulles, one of the complaints certainly is that you go up to the Hill and present them with a fait accompli and consult them after the fact rather than before the fact. Now is this case you have consulted them before the fact and you think that that can be an established practice hereafter?

DULLES:

Yes, we have kept them very fully posted, Mr. Bancroft, about this Japanese affair and about the negotiations with Australia and New Zealand. (inter.)

BANCROFT:
But have you ..(inter.)

DULLES:
They've been kept well in advance. You can know that because nothing has actually been done yet and I'm in touch with them about every week.

BANCROFT:
But have you solicited their advice and ever acted on it.

DULLES:
I have indeed.

SEVAREID:
What, Mr. Dulles, what does consultation on a thing like the peace treaty actually mean and the mechanics of consultation, does it mean that some senators really study the proposed treaty or the various drafts of it and make concrete suggestions themselves or do they just in a sense keep up with what you are doing on the matter.

DULLES:
Well, we have a very good Far Eastern sub-committee of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, takes a very active interest in these matters. Senator Sparksman is the chairman of it; Senator Alex. Smith and Senator Geo. ... and the .... the name escapes me at the moment, I know him perfectly well, we worked together with the most intimate detail with respect to these matters. I showed them the drafts of the peace treaty in advance before we circulate anything. We spend a good many hours together talking these things over. And we have the most close relations.

SHOLLEN:
Maybe the answer, Mr. Dulles, is you were a member of that body up there and there are some questions, I know Mr. Bancroft has covered the Hill up there many mant times for CBS maybe there're some politics involved in that.

DULLES:
Senator Burt Hickenlooper ... (inter.) ... I was trying to think of that name ... it is a fact that I've been up there in the Senate. I know all these people quite well personally. It makes easier to work with them perhaps.

BANCROFT:
Well, one question of course that immediately comes to mind - do you plan at all ever to try to get back to that august body up there, the Senate?

DULLES:
No, I have no ambitions beyond at the moment trying to push through this Japanese peace treaty, that's my job, and if I can accomplish that I will have accomplished a good deal and that's all I'm thinking about at the present time.

BANCROFT:
Well, this one other thing on the political matters, to what extent do you think this question of our whole policies in Asia will be an issue in the campaigns of 1952.

DULLES:
Well, I've no doubt it'll be a very active issue during the campaign and I think quite properly it should be.

SHOLLEN:
Mr. Collingwood!

COLLINGWOOD:
Well, Ambassador Dulles, I was about to call you Senator Dulles - we were talking about your past presence in that august body - ....

DULLES:
I'm honored to be called a senator.

COLLINGWOOD:
Well, we were talking about bipartisanship and you seem to think that you had no fears on that. In getting this Japanese peace treaty through then, your largest problems are with our Allies and with our opponents on the national scene. You're going over to Britain in a couple of weeks to talk with Foreign Secretary Morrison about this, what are the really big problems which divide us and the British on the problem of the Japanese peace treaty.

DULLES:
Well, one of the problems ... both problems have been discussed, alluded to, one is a problem of the recognition to be given to the Communist regime of China in the negotiation of the treaty. There we take opposite views. The second is the attitude towards Formosa, where the British have been disposed to feel that the peace treaty of Japan should actually convey title to Formosa to the Chinese Communists. Then you have a broad question of the economic future of Japan. Japan and the United Kingdom are competitors - trade competitors - and it's quite natural perhaps the British would want to put some restrictions upon the revival of their competitor particularly in the field of shipping and textiles.

COLLINGWOOD:
Well, now we haven't talked at all about the Korean war, which certainly has made some difference in this. Does the Korean war fit into our problems with Japan - does the fact that fighting is going on there and that the Korean peninsula is in jeopardy make the position of Japan any more acute from our point of view than it would have been otherwise?

DULLES:
Yes, it does. I think that the attack on Korea, the Republic of Korea, was made primarily with the idea of getting in a dominant position as regards Japan. Japan is a big goal that they're after.

COLLINGWOOD:
In attacking Korea?

DULLES:
In attacking Korea.

BANCROFT:
Well, you mean Russia not China, in this case.

DULLES:
I consider that the Chinese Communists are the puppets and just as the North Koreans were the puppets of the Soviet Union - I believe that they take orders from Moscow and from the Kremlin.

Now Korea has always been a strategic goal of Russia since the days of the Czars because it was the dagger at the heart of Japan and I believe that the reason for the attack, last June, upon South Korea was to get Russia into a strategic position where she could dominate Japan from both ends; she already now has Sakhalin, which is a dominant position north and if she could get South Korea Japan would be right between the pincers.

SHOLLEN:
Isn't that part of the agreements made during the war at Cairo and Yalta and those things ... Mr. Bancroft ...

BANCROFT:
Well, yest I understand it is but there is one question I wanted to ask was you mentioned that the British stand on Formosa, how do Australia and New Zealand stand on Formosa, are they on our side on that or on Britain's side on that?

DULLES:
I would say that the sympathies with us - they're island countries themselves in the Pacific and they don't like to see the Communists start in move into the islands.

As I said to Mr. Menzies, the Prime Minister of Australia, a little while ago, I said it's bad for us all if the Communists start island jumping in the Pacific. As long as they are a land-bound power it's not dangerous to Japan, the Philippines, Australia and New Zealand. But if they begin to get into these islands then it's serious.

COLLINGWOOD:
And that fits into our stand on Formosa I presume.

DULLES:
It does. I was saying that's the reason why in my opinion Australia and New Zealand are rather sympathetic to the United States viewpoint about Formosa.

BANCROFT:
They are closer to us that they are to Britain on that (inter.)

DULLES:
That's my impression.

COLLINGWOOD:
But you think that the real goal of the Communists in their attack on Korea was Japan and that therefore this is one of the reasons why it's necessary for us to hasten this peace treaty with the Japanese.

DULLES:
The big goal of Soviet communism, in my opinion, the post-war goal is Germany and Japan. If they could get the industrial power of those two countries and in the Pacific the seafaring power of Japan then they would be dominant in the world, at least they think they'd be dominant in the world. That's what they're after. And that in my opinion was their goal in their attack on ... their expired attack upon Korea.

SHOLLEN:
Mr. Dulles, we want to take this opportunity to thank you very much for being our guest on our program this evening from Washington on CAPITOL CLOAK ROOM. We thank you very much!

ANNOUNCER:
From Washington, Columbia has again brought you a meeting in Capitol Cloak Room, presenting tonight an outstanding public figure through informal interview. Our guest was John Foster Dulles, special ambassador of the President, and former Republican senator from New York. He was interviewed by 3 CBS correspondents -- Griffing Bancroft, Eric Sevareid and Chas. Collingwood. The moderator of the discussion was Lew Shollenberger, CBS Washington Director of special events.

THIS IS CBS ... THE COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM